Youngsters talk about space travel

Associated Press

DALLAS — They all agreed in Carol Jackson's fifth-grade class that space travel is a good thing and that the country should keep launching space missions.

But when the hands were counted in the small room at Stevens Park Elementary School in Oak Cliff, all were not sure that another teacher — particularly their own — should go.

"I don't want Ms. Jackson to get blown up," Angel Howard, 11, said flatly.

Across the Dallas area Wednesday, schoolchildren were caught between their natural enthusiasm for the idea of space adventure and the real prospect of danger or death it can pose.

Their classroom discussions about the explosion of the space shuttle Challenger found them struggling with how tough some choices must be.

In this fifth-grade classroom, a vote was taken and the decision was 8-5 that their teacher should still go if she had the chance.

"If she was to go, she could come back and represent our school," said Michelle Warr, 10, weighing the matter. "It's only one in a trillion that it could blow up."

Guadalupe Torres, 10, said, "If Ms. Jackson should go up in space she should have a year or two training, and if it catches on fire, they should have a way to get out."

All the students said they had seen the television broadcasts that showed the Challenger, with New Hampshire teacher Christa McAuliffe aboard, disintegrate after blastoff.

Some said they were still sad when they thought of the teacher's family watching. That was enough to make some decide other teachers should stay on the ground.

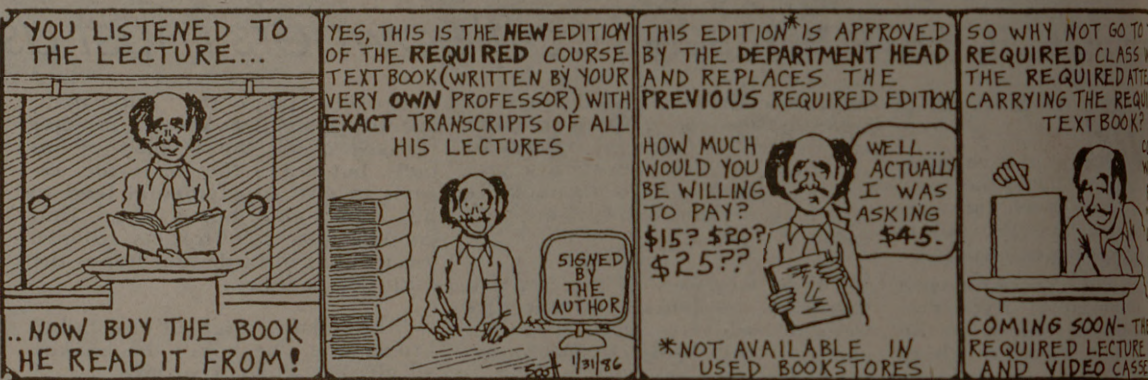

Sunsharae Smith, 10, said, "If Ms. Jackson wanted to go up, I would tell her not to go. But if she wanted to go anyway, I would tell them to hold the countdown until I ran back home and got my things to go with her."

Several students said they had decided that only astronauts, who are professionals at traveling in space, should take the risk from now on.

Amy Mireles, 10, said, "Astronauts are trained, they have been up there before..."

NASA's usual buzz of activity suspended

Associated Press

SPACE CENTER, Houston — On a normal Thursday, this nerve center for the U.S. space program would be abuzz with more than 7,000 workers trying to keep up with the shuttle program's ambitious calendar.

But normal days ended in a split second over the Atlantic Ocean, and most of NASA was frozen in time Thursday.

NASA spokesman Terry White said experts pored over data and held meetings as part of the investigation into the explosion of Challenger Tuesday, but thousands of other workers were left idle because the space program has been put on hold.

Normally training and planning for future missions continues at the Johnson Space Center while a shuttle is in space.

The place is usually a whirlwind of activity.

Instead, gloomy NASA employees walked around the campus-like complex Thursday, some watching reporters at work and some observing preparations for President Reagan's visit Friday.

Astronaut training, mission planning and preparation, research and engineering, tracking and communications have all been suspended. NASA official Charlotte Hines said astronauts were "coordinating ef-orts for the families," and resume training Monday.

At the Kennedy Space Center Florida, work to get other ready came to a standstill.

NASA had planned to launch shuttle Atlantis at midnight Monday and move it to launch pad used for all shuttle launches Tuesday's — next Tuesday, which had been set for March 6, sits in storage.
