Dormitory students learn about theft risks

By KRISTI GILL
Reporter

A program of checking open doors to prevent more burglaries in dormitories has been activated by the staff of Mosher Hall.

Karen Knoepfli, the dormitory's head resident, said the program, called GOTCHA, requires Mosher staff members to make checks of dorm halls and leave notes in unattended rooms with open doors.

The note will tell the resident that someone was able to enter their room without their knowledge or permission, Knoepfli said, and will warn the resident of the room that although the staff member was not a burglar, it would have been just as easy for a burglar to enter the room.

Residents leave their rooms open and unattended without ever thinking about the fact that no one is around to watch their belongings, she said.

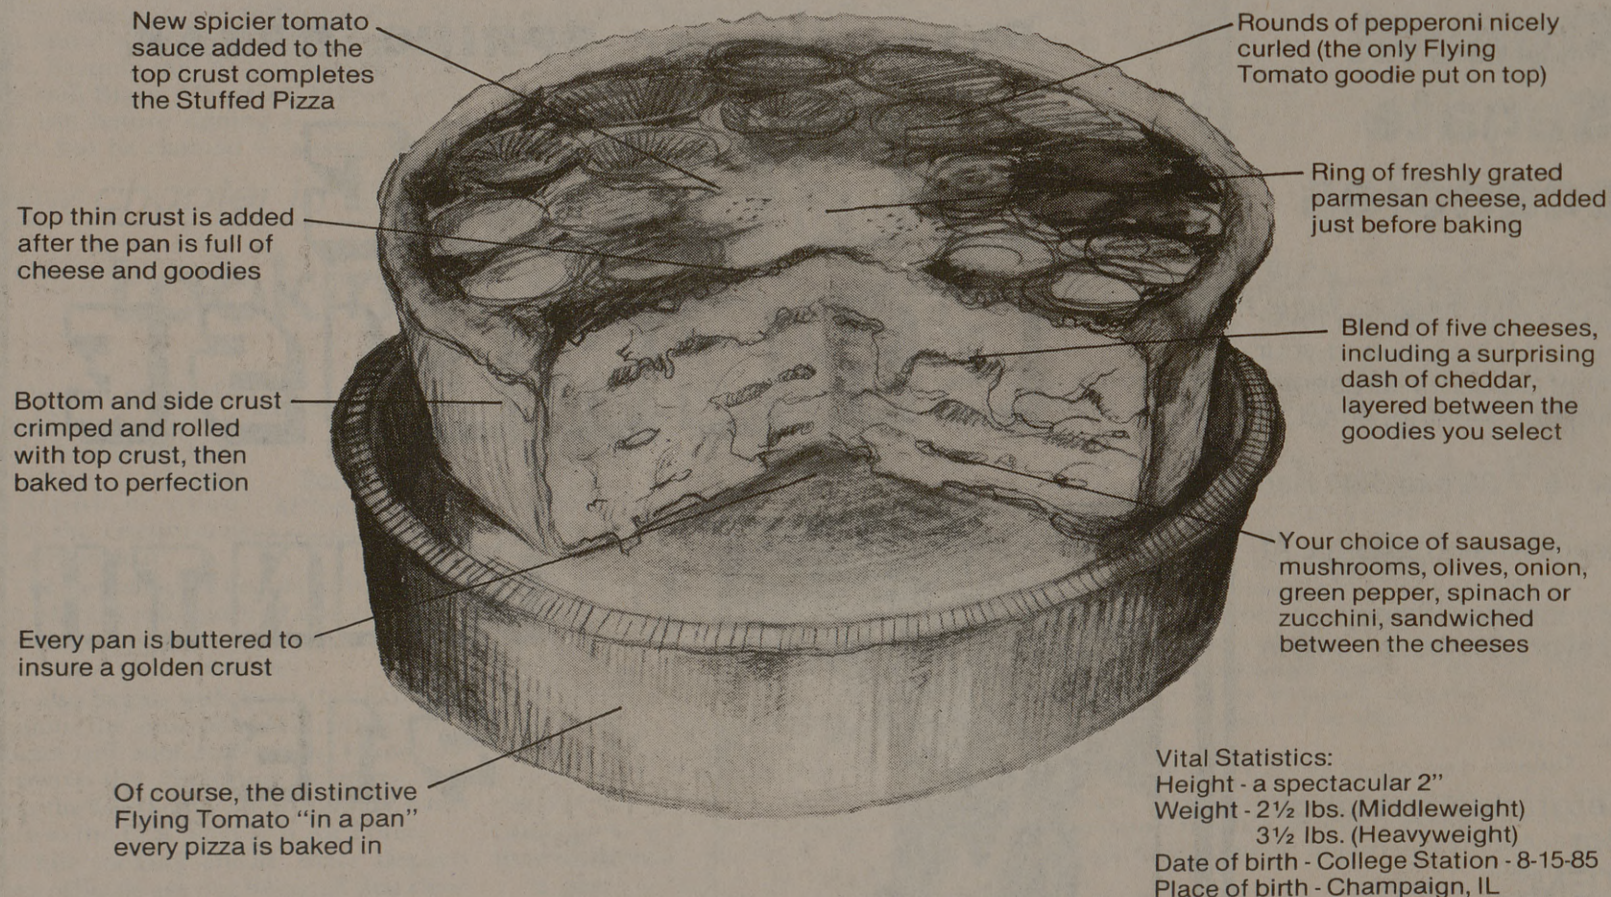

Knoepfli said the rooms that have been burglarized have been the ones with the door wide open and no one inside, she said.

"The notes kind of make the (the residents) realize how easy something can happen," Knoepfli said.

The staff is hoping the program will make the residents want to lock their doors or at least close them without having to be prompted, she said.
