CS ordinance will protect city workers against lawsuits

By Craig Renfro
Staff Writer

The College Station City Council passed an ordinance Thursday which will provide insurance for city officials and employees to protect them against lawsuits while performing city policy.

The ordinance, prepared at the request of city manager William Cole, will cover city employees unless the lawsuit stems from an illegal act, or is in violation of city policy, city attorney Cathy Locke says.

Funds for the self-insurance program will come from the city's budget, says Glenn Schroeder, deputy director of finance. The city's employee insurance coverage expired Jan. 15. However, employees would have been covered from the city's budget before this ordinance was passed, Schroeder says.

Councilman James Bond expressed concern that the city would be responsible for covering court costs in a long and lengthy trial.

"Suppose a city official awarded a contract and there was some technical, legal loophole which says we didn't do it just right, and somebody sued, then the city would be held liable," Bond says.

The city's general comprehensive liability coverage expired Jan. 1, and the city has hired an insurance consultant to look at insurance coverage possibilities, Schroeder says. The consultant will have insurance recommendations within two weeks, he says.

In other action the council passed an ordinance which will keep the hotel-motel tax rate at six percent.

The current six percent rate would have dropped to five percent June 30 if the council had not passed the ordinance. The six percent rate is estimated to produce $550,000 in revenue for the fiscal year 1986-87, Locke says.

Locke says the ordinance will allow the rate to remain at six percent for the next two years.

Councilwoman Terri Tongco says the rate should be reviewed each year since budgets must be presented every year and the city needs to know how much money from the fund can be available for budgeting.

In other business, the council also approved two rezoning requests.

The first request changes a section of University Park, near the Highway 6 bypass, from townhouse-rowhouse to administrative-professional. The second change rezones the College Station Business Center from general-commercial to commercial-industrial.

The Planning and Zoning Committee recommended approval of these requests at its March 19 meeting.
