Census form to be tested on families

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Census Bureau is about to give its 1990 head count a spring tryout, sending test forms to about 48,000 households across the nation.

Although the official census remains more than four years in the future, the agency is already struggling with the logistics of counting nearly a quarter-billion Americans, and learning as much as possible about them.

In addition to the census of population and housing, proposals in this or past years have ranged from counting the nation's dogs and cats to asking people's religious beliefs and sex habits.

Census Director John G. Keane says in a message to households receiving the test questionnaires, "The census is more than just a count of the population. It is a chance for us to take stock of ourselves as a people and successfully meet future local and national challenges."
