100-member commission of West Berlin and American military police.

Manfred Ganschow, director of West Berlin security police, said Sunday that three separate claims of responsibility telephoned the day of the explosion to news agencies in London and Berlin "cannot be considered authentic."

The Berliner Morgenpost daily newspaper said investigators were focusing on anti-Western Arab militants in West Berlin.

It quoted unidentified West Berlin security officials as saying the Libyan Embassy in East Berlin, the capital of East Germany, could have served as headquarters for the bombers.

The Morgenpost quoted Ganschow as saying intelligence reports indicated "fanatical Arabs operating independently of one another" had slipped into West Berlin recently.

Ganschow told a news conference that investigators continued to zero in on leftist and foreign terrorist groups, but "no concrete clues" surfaced to identify the bombers.

In Bonn, the West German capital, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher established a working group of experts to see if foreign governments, not identified, could have been involved in the disco bombing.

Steven Stromvall, spokesman for the U.S. military's Berlin Brigade, said 18 Americans injured in the explosion remained hospitalized Sunday for burns and other injuries.

ment as a method to pressure the government.

After Muraya spoke, the demonstrators marched from the College Station City Hall to Rudder Tower where they chanted "I, you, we all say: Apartheid must go and the time is today."

At Rudder, David Ellis, president of Students Working Against Many Problems, told demonstrators that the United States can't ignore problems in other nations.

"It's a world community," he said, "and South Africa is holding back human resources that will affect us."

"We have to tell our congressmen to quit supporting South Africa. We have to tell our companies to quit supporting South Africa."

Dr. Larry Yarak, an A&M history professor, labeled apartheid a "monstrous system."

"It's a police state armed to the teeth to protect white privilege," he said.

Thirty million people live in South Africa — 70 percent black, 17 percent white, 9 percent mixed and 3 percent Asian.

But in South Africa, Yarak said, 13 percent of the land is for 70 percent of the people, which makes the blacks aliens in their own land.

Yarak also addressed the Reagan administration and its actions regarding South Africa.

In September, the administration banned loans to South Africa, computer sales and the sale of krugers in the United States.

"But," Yarak said, "the administration was not acting out of moral indignation — it was acting from constituent's pressure."

Yarak said people should support the blacks in Africa and demand total U.S. divestment.

"This would send an unmistakable message to the ruling white minority," he said.

Congress to consider firearm, tax legislation

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congress returns from its Easter recess this week with the House ready to take up firearms legislation that has put the National Rifle Association and police organizations at opposite ends of the barrel.

The Senate Finance Committee will resume its work on a tax overhaul bill, while on the Senate floor debate continues on whether to sell Washington's two federal airports to a local authority.

The House reconvenes Tuesday to consider some non-controversial bills, including one naming a fellowship program after Christa McAuliffe, the New Hampshire teacher who died in the Challenger explosion.

Then, on Wednesday, the representatives are scheduled to debate and decide between competing versions of legislation to alter the 1968 Gun Control Act.

A bill sponsored by Rep. Harold L. Volkmer, D-Mo., and supported by the NRA is similar to Senate-passed legislation. It would permit interstate sale and transportation of handguns, rifles and shotguns.

Police organizations and House Democratic leaders support a rival bill allowing interstate transportation and sales of long guns — but not handguns. The bill drafted by the House Judiciary Committee would allow sales of rifles and shotguns by dealers in one state to sportsmen from another state, so long as the gun laws of both states are followed.

The committee bill would require that police records of buyers be checked following a sale, not the case in the Volkmer bill.
