Volunteers say they benefit from work in A&M project

By Melissa Spann
Reporter

A new project developed at A&M is allowing volunteers to get a return on their investment of love and care for nursing home residents.

Project OASIS, Older Adults Sharing Important Skills, not only benefits the people with whom volunteers share their skills, but it also benefits the volunteers, said Dr. Judith Warren, co-director of the project and a gerontologist at the Texas Agriculture Extension Service.

This program is designed to train older adult volunteers to help serve nursing home residents, Warren said.

The volunteers help provide a positive mental health atmosphere within the nursing home, she said. To provide this positive atmosphere, volunteers help the residents with their personal problems and with sharing their feelings, Warren said.

Most of the volunteers are older and losing friends or spouses. Project OASIS gives them a new group of friends because they become close by working together, she said.

Mary Ezell, a project volunteer, said she thinks she learns from the people.

"I learn something new everyday," she said. "I didn't ask for that or expect it. I am the volunteer. I expected to give, but I'm also receiving."

Ezell, who was a social activities director at nursing homes in Mississippi, said she became interested in the program because of her background. The volunteers' backgrounds and experience varies, she said. But Warren says most of the volunteers have had little experience with volunteer work.

Ezell said, "I'm interested in giving of some of what I have, which is care and love, to those which are less fortunate."

Training sessions are conducted for the volunteers to educate them on various situations and pro... Volunteers help nursing home... dents deal with the problems ... ing and living in an institution, ... ren said.
