as an FBI failure who sought revenge on his employers and sold out his country for money and sex.

The defense argued, however, that Miller was merely a bumbling patriot who believed he could save his crumbling career by becoming a double agent and entering the secret world of Soviet intelligence.

Miller's lawyers switched their strategy in the second trial and called to the witness stand Soviet emigre Svetlana Ogorodnikov, his lover who allegedly lured Miller into spying.

Jury foreman Jorge Cuellar said outside court that the jurors had little doubt that Miller was guilty.

"Very early on, we thought there was just no way he could be acting the way he did (if he was not guilty)," Cuellar said.

Asked what single piece of evidence was the most important in convicting Miller, Cuellar said, "His own statements. His own confessions."

its own course requirements and eliminate unnecessary courses.

"We're talking about what we should be doing to start people out on living and start people out on being a practicing engineer," he said. "You really ought to look at that (the engineering curriculum) every so often and not just become complacent with what we've been doing in the past."

Curriculum concerns, however, will make up only a small portion of McDonald's duties. He will act primarily as the vice president of academic affairs.

In that position, he plans to explore ways to cut the administrative costs of his office as well as increase its efficiency.

McDonald said the closer he gets to assuming the position of provost, the more he sees the enormous amount of paperwork the office produces.

"I knew they were busy but the enormity of the paper flow is just now coming to my attention," McDonald said. "(It) is a serious problem, I think perhaps the administration is too strung out."

"It might be something worth looking at — is there some way we can get this thing under control? I'm not saying it is possible because I do not know. But it's a problem that has to be faced."

Louis le Grange, the law and order minister.

At least 40 union leaders are among more than 1,000 people known to have been jailed without charge under the state of emergency. The government does not say how many have been detained and unofficial estimates range up to 3,000.

Michael Wright, personnel manager of the Central News Agency, a major news distributor and retailer, said, "All efforts to reach any union officials have failed. We do not know where they are."

Emergency regulations have brought an unprecedented security clampdown and severe restrictions on journalists. Reporters may not identify detainees, report "subversive statements" or write about security force actions without official permission.

The Foreign Correspondents' Association said its members "are now subject to probably the most severe censorship applied to foreign journalists anywhere in the world."

At the daily news briefing of the Bureau for Information, now virtually the sole source of official information, chief spokesman Dave Steward said he was wrong Wednesday to describe as "devoid of truth" a report that leaflets were air-dropped into black townships around Pretoria telling residents to stay indoors during the day. He said the leaflets had been dropped, telling people to stay indoors for their own safety.
