Bill provides indigent care

State ready for new law

AUSTIN (AP) — Texas counties are preparing for the Sept. 1 implementation of a new law designed to provide health care for what one lawmaker calls "the poorest of the poor."

The new law basically says every Texas county will be required to put aside as much as 10 percent of the total local tax levy to provide health care for the indigent. This has rural county officials grumbling over the potential expense.

"The state passed the burden onto us against our wills," said Williamson County Judge Don Wilson.

Under the provisions of the new law — the most comprehensive health care plan in Texas history — Williamson County could be liable for as much as $550,000 in health care costs for its poor.

This new responsibility is the result of one of the most hotly debated legislative issues in 1985 — paying for indigent health care.

Lawmakers were so at odds over the issue that the bill died during the regular session when lawmakers ran out of time. Gov. Mark White immediately called lawmakers into special session and the legislation was approved.

County officials now are wrestling with the program.

"There's lots of gray areas that haven't been settled properly," said Bastrop County Judge Jack Griesenbeck, whose county will be liable for up to $200,000.

Cameron County Judge Moises Vella already has resigned himself to the fact that there is "no question about raising taxes." Vella said his South Texas county could be responsible for as much as $800,000.

Ronnie Dannelley, administrator for Hays County, is raising money to follow the law. He says it will be one of the biggest challenges facing the county in the upcoming budget process.

Bryan Sperry is the director of the Indigent Health Care Project, a Department of Human Services agency directed by the Legislature to oversee the program.

The health care package has major provisions, but county officials are mostly concerned with the Indigent Health Care and Treatment Act, which also is the County Responsibility Act.

The act basically says that Texas counties without hospitals or public hospitals are financially responsible for those who "fall between the cracks," Sperry said.
