NASA controversy

Transfer of space station halted

WASHINGTON (AP) — NASA would have to get permission from Congress before taking any people or programs away from the Johnson Space Center in Houston under an amendment adopted Thursday by the House Appropriations Committee.

About an hour before the committee acted, NASA Administrator James C. Fletcher announced at a hastily called news conference that he would delay for 90 days a plan to move some research on the space station from Houston to the Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Ala.

"NASA really did not do the right thing when it failed to inform Congress fully when it adopted the management restructuring of the space station," Fletcher told the Associated Press.

An amendment sponsored by the three Texans on the Appropriations Committee was added to the NASA appropriations measure on a 30-22 vote.

Committee members want Congress to have more say about the way the space agency is run in the wake of the space shuttle Challenger disaster last January.

Rep. Robert Mrazek, D-N.Y., said Congress had relied on NASA expertise in the past, "perhaps too heavily."

The space agency's proposed reorganization of its space station program drew angry reaction from the Texas congressional delegation who saw the move as a weakening of Houston's status in manned space flight research. Fletcher attended a fence-mending meeting with the congressmen last week and flew to Houston the next day to explain the plan to Space Center employees.

Earlier in the week, members of the Houston Chamber of Commerce went to the White House to complain to Vice President George Bush.

Houston is suffering from high unemployment because of low oil prices. The business community sees the Johnson Space Center as an important and prestigious entitlement to new, high-technology industry.

Fletcher said the reorganization would have put management of research on the space station's life support system at Huntsville, the same location as the main contractor building the station.

He said the move would have eliminated 300 jobs which otherwise would have gone to Houston, although he said early misinformation indicated 1,900 jobs would be lost at Houston. He said it was still undecided where some 1,000 jobs would go.

Center gets support from Texans

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Texas congressional delegation rallied around Houston when NASA threatened to cut the work done at the Johnson Space Center.

Rep. Tom Loeffler, R-Hunt, who gave up his seat in an unsuccessful bid for the Republican gubernatorial nomination, introduced an amendment in the House Appropriations Committee on Thursday that said NASA could not move any programs or personnel out of Houston without the approval of Congress.

The Democrats on the committee, Ron Coleman of El Paso and Charles Wilson of Lufkin, campaigned for votes. The amendment passed, 30-22, as Mike Andrews, D-Houston; Joe Barton, R-Ennis; Tom DeLay, R-Sugar Land; and Jack Fields, R-

Humble, watched from the sidelines.

Virtually the entire delegation was up in arms when NASA proposed moving research on the life support system from Houston to the Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, Ala.

Andrews said, "What you've seen this week is what's always been true. We have on the House side a tremendous amount of bipartisanship on issues that affect our state."

Coleman said, "There are some things behind the scenes that are just as important. The Texas delegation historically is known for that ability, and we carried the day today on this issue. There are going to be future days, so it's not over."
