AIDS vaccine tests show good results for chimpanzees

SAN ANTONIO (AP)—Tests on chimpanzees inoculated with preliminary forms of a vaccine show two kinds of protection against the AIDS virus, but additional work is needed for more definitive results, researchers say.

Scientists have reported the results of experiments in San Antonio and Atlanta.

Dr. George Todaro, scientific director of Oncogen, a Seattle-based firm that developed two varieties of a possible AIDS vaccine, said Oncogen is testing the vaccines at the Southwest Foundation for Biomedical Research in San Antonio.

Laboratory tests, using serum obtained from the chimps vaccinated against the AIDS, showed that the chimps had developed antibodies against the AIDS virus.

The tests also showed that a second protective mechanism existed called cell-mediated immunity that involves the accumulation of special white blood cells near the AIDS virus.

Antibodies are the first-line of chemical warriors in the body's natural defense system.

The two primate centers are among only four research institutions in the United States testing possible AIDS vaccines in chimps, considered the final step before human trials.

protect against actual direct infection with the virus," Todaro said Tuesday. "They appear to be working in the laboratory."

Todaro said he believes it will be almost a year before more definitive results can be obtained after the chimps are injected with the AIDS virus.

More research could begin later this month and would involve injecting the chimps with a serum containing the AIDS virus.

The vaccines are made from a weakened type of smallpox virus into which scientists have spliced protein-making genes from the AIDS virus.

The question is whether this will

GRADUATE STUDENTS!

Does your department have a graduate student organization (G.S.O.)? If not, you may be missing some of the benefits a G.S.O. can provide:

- Channel of communications between faculty and students
- Planning of social functions
- Help in recruiting and orienting new students
- Information on taxes, insurance, etc.
- And many more

To find out more, come to the workshop sponsored by your department's Graduate Student Council. There is no charge and we will provide refreshments.

When: September 13, 9:00 a.m. — 12:00 p.m.
Where: Room 112, Oceanography and Meteorology Building
