Disinformation

documents designed to show, at least implicitly, that the United States is at a disadvantage at times with the Soviet Union because of Moscow's propensity to spread lies through an "active measures" program.

A report issued in October 1981 began by asserting that the Soviets two months earlier had attempted to blame the United States for the death of Panamanian leader Omar Torrijos and for the 1979 seizure of the Grand Mosque of Mecca.

On Aug. 29 of this year, two weeks after the Post story claimed that the administration had approved the alleged disinformation campaign against Gadhafi, the State Department made public three documents it said were forgeries designed to discredit U.S. foreign policy.

Department officials were unable to identify the forgers but suggested that Moscow was the prime suspect.

One of the documents was a speech in which Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger purportedly said the Strategic Defense Initiative was designed to give the United States a first strike capability.

The State Department rejected the forgery, which first surfaced in West Germany, as a clear case of disinformation.

Another forgery, mailed to the Post and other publications, described an alleged United States information Agency campaign to ensure that the West European would receive reports exaggerating the death and destruction resulting from the nuclear power accident at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union in April.

Submarine

chael Armacost, the under secretary of state for political affairs who appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Armacost said there was a report that at one point the sub "had been under way at a very slow speed under its own power, perhaps auxiliary diesel power." But "other difficulties apparently developed," or the sub "had been stopped briefly," he said.

Sen. Sam Nunn of Georgia, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said, "The chances of any kind of nuclear detonation are very, very low."

Shultz and Nunn also said the Soviets, apparently mindful of the criticism after the nuclear disaster at Chernobyl, seemed to be cooperating in providing information about the accident.

"I think they got badly burned at Chernobyl because you can't say these things no matter what," Shultz said, referring to the Soviets' error in reporting that accident.
