White offers to take lie test over bugging

AUSTIN (AP) — Gov. Mark White volunteered Thursday to take a lie detector test as he reiterated that neither he nor his staff had anything to do with the electronic bug found in the office of his opponent's campaign consultant.

An electronic sweep detected the bug Sunday in the Austin office of Karl Rove, top strategist for GOP candidate Bill Clements. Officials said the sweep was conducted because information they thought was secret had been leaked.

A matchbook-sized radio transmitter was found behind a picture on a wall near Rove's desk telephone. The FBI and the Texas Department of Public Safety are investigating.

White said he told his staff to ask DPS Col. Jim Adams to take whatever action is necessary to get to the bottom of it as quickly as possible.

Use of listening devices without court orders or the knowledge of those whose conversations are being monitored is a felony under both state and federal law.

Seeking to dispel rumors that they planted the bug themselves, top Clements campaign officials said they will take lie detector tests to prove their innocence.

Reggie Bashur, Clements' campaign spokesman, reiterated that the GOP side is making no claims that White or his staff was behind the bugging.

"If the governor of Texas says he and his staff had nothing to do with it, you have to believe that," Bashur said. "We have never accused them of anything." But he said that "our political opposition would be the group to most benefit" from any stolen information.

White said the Republicans had no valid reason to suspect anyone was surreptitiously listening in.
