Sheriff: AIDS victims' trials 'waste money'

DENTON (AP) — The Denton County sheriff said it is expensive and "a waste of money" to conduct a trial for Texas prison inmates who are suffering from AIDS and not expected to live.

Denton County Sheriff Randy Kaisner said Wednesday that Texas prison inmates with acquired immune deficiency syndrome who are returned to Denton County for trial on other charges must be isolated and that this procedure is costly.

"It's a waste of money to bring back people who are never going to live to get out of the penitentiary anyway," said Kaisner.

"When we don't have the jail space, and if they don't get anything added to their original sentence — that's a waste of money," he said.

The sheriff has asked the Denton County commissioners to devise a policy on the transfer of state prisoners who have contracted AIDS.

A Denton County Commissioners Court attorney, Jim Allison, said the commissioners will not become involved in the issue of how to house AIDS prisoners.

Allison said that the movement of prisoners is the responsibility of the district attorney and the sheriff and that the commissioners have no role in decisions about the custody of prisoners.

Denton County Judge Buddy Cole said the court will go no further with the issue.
