Red tide publicity still lingers

SOUTH PADRE ISLAND (AP) — Blooms of the deadly red tide that killed more than two million fish, shut down oyster harvests and dented the Texas tourism industry seem to have vanished.
But resentment over the bad publicity it caused lingers.
"The press painted a picture that this amorphous mass of red death had somehow swallowed the Texas coast and it just wasn't true," Dick Bushnell, spokesman for the South Padre Island Tourist Bureau, said. "But when you smear red ink on a graph the public tends to get the impression there is a tremendous problem."
The red tide washed into this far South Texas resort in mid-October from the north, but Bushnell said unlike other areas along the coast, South Padre was only brushed by the tide's killing fumes.
At least one convention was cancelled and untold tourist dollars were lost, he said.
Mark Hamner, general manager of the South Padre Hilton Resort, said the way the red tide was reported "carried a lingering effect in areas where we could have generated additional business but didn't. People still ask about red tide and we haven't had red tide in three weeks."
Besides tourism, "we have no industry unless you count T-shirts," he added. "We sell what we have — sunny weather, pretty beaches and a nice place to stay," Hamner said.
Don Hockaday, of Pan American University's Coastal Studies Laboratory on South Padre, said red tide is a phenomena caused when water temperature, salinity, weather and other factors combine to spark the unchecked reproduction of a dinoflagellate, a type of microorganism.
Blooms of red tide emit at least two toxins that cause irritation to human eyes, the nose and throat and kill fish, Hockaday said.
The organism builds up in shellfish such as oysters, and eating contaminated shellfish can cause illness, health officials said.
A killing red tide had not struck the Texas coast for at least 20 years when the blooms began forming in late August along the upper coast.

Within the first 10 days of September, major fish kills were reported from San Louis Pass to Cavallo Pass near Port O'Connor.
From Sept. 9 through early November, red tide blooms were spotted from the air along most of the coast between eastern Matagorda Bay to the lower Laguna Madre, Tom Heffernan, director of field operations for coastal fisheries of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department, said.
No blooms have been reported since early November and no dead fish have been sighted recently, he said.
Beaches in Corpus Christi were closed as a result of the red tide, which prompted the state health department to suspend oyster harvests.

HOUSTON (AP) — Some sixth-graders at Welch Middle School learned a new phrase last week — sex drive.
It's all part of a pilot project approved by school officials who are concerned about the increasing number of teen-age pregnancies.
Several hundred sixth-grade students at three middle schools in the Houston Independent School District are taking "family-life education" courses. The voluntary, 12-week course includes sex education.
The pilot classes mark a first in the school district. Sex education has been taboo until now except for general discussions in health classes.
School board members approved the courses earlier this year after expressing dismay over the pregnancy rate among teen-agers.

HOUSTON (AP) — Dick Kuan, a Hong Kong native, followed all the rules and filled out all the necessary documents to remain in the United States legally.
Now, Kuan is frustrated with the amnesty provision for illegal aliens passed in the new immigration bill. If he had lived here illegally since before Jan. 1, 1982, he would be eligible for residency status.
"People who came here illegally before 1982 are automatically granted permanent residency, and I really don't think that's fair," said the 29-year-old computer supervisor who came to the country in 1976.
"For all the years that I've been in the States, I've been doing the best I can to follow exactly what is required for legal residency," he said.

Houston ISD sixth graders get sex education classes

HOUSTON (AP) — Some sixth-graders at Welch Middle School learned a new phrase last week — sex drive.
It's all part of a pilot project approved by school officials who are concerned about the increasing number of teen-age pregnancies.
Several hundred sixth-grade students at three middle schools in the Houston Independent School District are taking "family-life education" courses. The voluntary, 12-week course includes sex education.
The pilot classes mark a first in the school district. Sex education has been taboo until now except for general discussions in health classes.
School board members approved the courses earlier this year after expressing dismay over the pregnancy rate among teen-agers.

Evenually, district officials hope to expand the courses to all schools in the area.
At the district's Kay Ongoing Education School, a campus for pregnant teens, the number of students increased from 302 in 1981 to 453 in 1985, officials said.
School officials say more younger students are becoming pregnant. Two fifth-graders attended the Kay campus last year.
Teachers in the new sex education program say the youths ask plenty of questions.
"No question is dumb," said teacher Barbara Meadoughs, citing one of the rules of the class.
Many of the lessons center on decision-making and the consequences. Sexually transmitted diseases, including the fatal acquired immune deficiency syndrome, also are discussed.

The subject of birth control was discussed at all three schools — Williams and Marshall middle schools. Meadoughs said she thinks students the best method of birth control because it is 100 percent effective.
Students are encouraged to discuss what they learn in class with their parents, she said.
Although several parents have expressed their children out of the classroom cause they were uncomfortable with the subject matter, instructors insist that the classes are offered to all students.
"The kids are bombarded with sex through advertising and movies," Meadoughs said. "We know it is on their minds."

Immigration bill causes problems for legal aliens who play by rules

HOUSTON (AP) — Dick Kuan, a Hong Kong native, followed all the rules and filled out all the necessary documents to remain in the United States legally.
Now, Kuan is frustrated with the amnesty provision for illegal aliens passed in the new immigration bill. If he had lived here illegally since before Jan. 1, 1982, he would be eligible for residency status.
"People who came here illegally before 1982 are automatically granted permanent residency, and I really don't think that's fair," said the 29-year-old computer supervisor who came to the country in 1976.
"For all the years that I've been in the States, I've been doing the best I can to follow exactly what is required for legal residency," he said.

"The amnesty law does not take into consideration people like us," he said. "To be legal citizens we still have to go through all the politics and waiting. . . . I have to apply for labor certification, which has to be granted first before I can apply for permanent residency. That might be five years down the road."
Many foreigners here legally say the changes threaten their jobs and even their family unity, while illegal aliens who skirted the laws will be "rewarded" with permanent residency status, the Houston Post reported Sunday.
"When Congress addressed the issue, they knew they were only letting illegal people in," said Immigration and Naturalization Service spokesman Duke Austin in Washington.

"Some people say that was a mistake," he said.
A Filipino nurse who recently told to return home after working in Houston legally for nearly a year said the new immigration law was breaking up her family.
The nurse, who was not interviewed by the Post, has held a work permit for special skills all 10 years, but the recently established a policy puts a five-year cap on such visas.
The nurse's husband is illegal. He probably will be able to stay under the amnesty law. Their children were born in the U.S. and can stay, too.
"It's not like we are liabilities," said. "Why can't we stay?"
