Honeywell joins companies moving out of South Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Honeywell Inc. will sell its small operation here to a local firm and join the exodus of American companies from South Africa, a company executive said Thursday.

The sale to South African owners follows a pattern set by General Motors Corp., IBM and dozens of other U.S. companies which bowed to disinvestment pressure from the anti-apartheid movement and to poor economic conditions.

A major South African industrial group, Murray and Roberts, is to purchase the Honeywell operation for an undisclosed amount and all 175 employees probably will keep their jobs, said Markos Tambakera, Honeywell's local managing director.

At Honeywell's Minneapolis headquarters, spokeswoman Susan Eich said, "I think it's generally acknowledged that the business environment in South Africa is volatile.

"We took into account the total business environment in that country and came to the conclusion it's in our best interest to sell the affiliate to Murray and Roberts."

The Honeywell affiliate, which sells and services electronic control systems for buildings and industries, accounts for less than 1 percent of Honeywell's revenues, which totaled $6.6 billion last year, Eich said.

Such systems manage equipment, monitor industrial and other processes, and collect data.

More than 60 American companies have left South Africa since January 1985, including at least 24 this year.

Last month, Eastman Kodak Co. announced not only that it would leave, eliminating the jobs of its employees, but also that it would sell the sale of its products in South Africa.

The American companies remaining in South Africa have investments totaling an estimated $1.3 billion.

Murder

Kauffman-Linam as the two fought. "She started fighting and he was trying to keep her shut up, and she ended up strangled in the fight, according to him (Primrose)," Miller said.

As it was getting light outside, Primrose left the house and went down the street to an apartment where he had been staying for about a month with a friend, Miller said.

"He stayed at the friend's house until that night when it got dark, and then he went back to the girl's apartment at about 7:30 p.m. or 8 p.m.," Miller said.

He said that, according to Primrose's written statement, Primrose went back to the apartment, bound Kauffman-Linam's hands and feet and then began collecting some of her things in a knapsack. Primrose said he didn't sexually assault the woman, Miller said.

Miller said Primrose said he intended to haul the body off to a dump site somewhere, but while he was still in the apartment, one of Kauffman-Linam's friends came through the back door and saw the body on the floor.

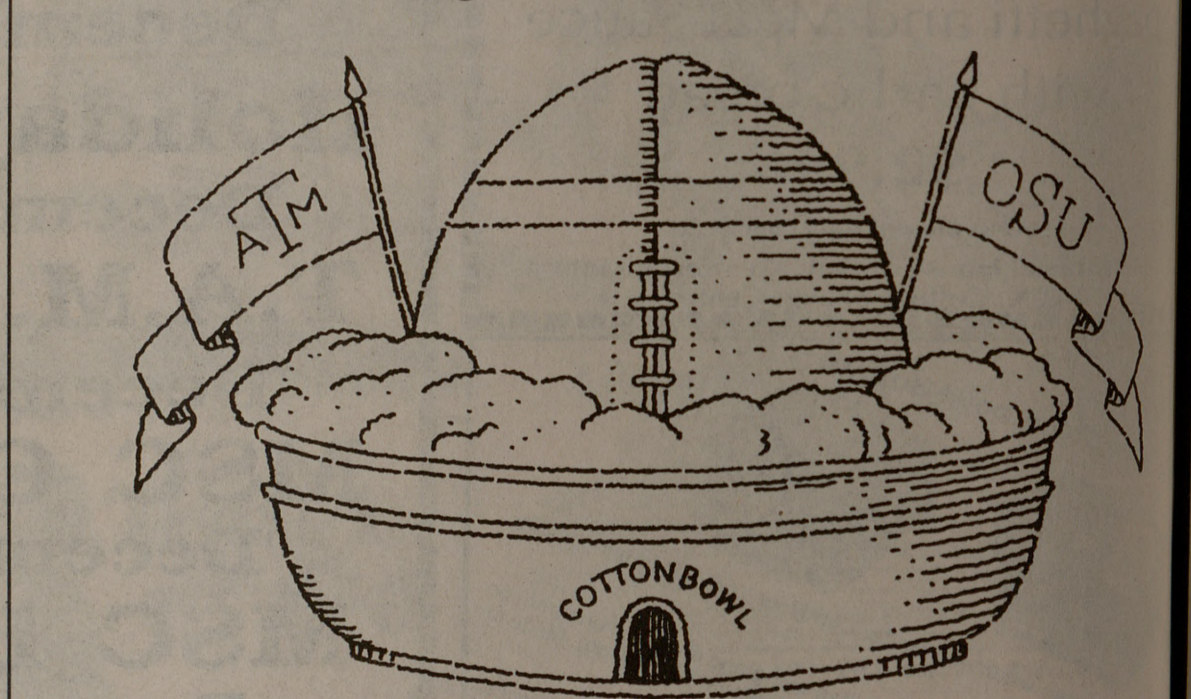

Miller said Primrose said he got out the front door and into the woods near Easterwood Airport where he spent the night.

The next morning, Miller said Primrose said he stole the truck and drove to Arkansas, where he was rested and later transported back to Texas.

Primrose, originally from Texas, had been attending college at university until about two years ago, Miller said.

He said Primrose quit school to work in an oilfield in the Brazos College Station area.
