State tort reform fight begins in Legislature

AUSTIN (AP) — A long-awaited legislative battle over liability insurance and personal injury lawsuits began Monday before the Senate Economic Development Committee.

Hundreds of spectators, many of them wearing labels and carrying placards for or against tort reform, jammed the Senate chamber.

Attorney General Jim Mattox, one of the first witnesses, urged the committee to postpone any action on the proposed legislation until it had more information.

"I don't think this is a lawsuit crisis, but it is a crisis of insurance," Mattox told the committee.

"Don't restrict our jurors," he said.

J.P. Word, Austin attorney and president of a coalition called Texas Civil Justice League, said Texas businesses want relief from rapidly rising liability insurance and costs of court judgments.

"There are a lot of angry Texans out there, and they are determined," Word said.

"They are not getting a square deal out of the civil justice system," he said.

Waiting to testify were numerous witnesses from Texans for Civil Justice, a group against proposed court reforms.

Sen. O.H. "Ike" Harris, R-Dallas, committee chairman, said the hearing Monday on six tort-reform measures would be followed by a hearing next week on several insurance reform measures.

Harris said authors of the measures had asked that their bills be sent to a subcommittee for further study after the two weeks of hearings.

Sen. Grant Jones, D-Temple, presented a proposed constitutional amendment that would empower the Legislature to regulate any court actions for damages sought in personal injury suits.

"We feel the Legislature should reestablish the fact that it is the Legislature, not the Supreme Court, that sets public policy," Jones said.

Sen. Kent Caperton, D-Bryan, said, "If you let the Legislature determine the access to civil courts, you will have a lot more unpredictability."

"We surprise the people every time we finish a session," he said.
