Limited funds may hinder AIDS battle

AUSTIN (AP) — Gov. Bill Clements said Tuesday he has no idea where the state might find $1.4 million that health officials say is needed to combat the spread of AIDS in Texas.

Clements said he supports a proposal by state Health Commissioner Robert Bernstein for stepped-up education, testing and study to battle the deadly disease.

But Clements said the state government's budget crisis makes it difficult to obtain funding for such a program.

"As far as supporting in concept his idea that we must address the issue of AIDS, I thoroughly, totally support that," Clements told his weekly news conference.

AIDS, acquired immune deficiency syndrome, is a disease that attacks the body's ability to fight disease.

On Monday, Bernstein said the number of AIDS cases in Texas could hit 60,000 by 1996 if nothing is done.

Bernstein, who just returned from a national conference on AIDS in Atlanta, said the health department currently is spending about $1 million for counseling AIDS victims, educating people about the disease and testing for AIDS.

Bernstein said the department is asking the Legislature for about $1.4 million for the next two years to expand counseling, antibody testing and increased surveillance of AIDS cases.

The department also is asking the federal government for more funding.

But lawmakers already are wrestling with a state budget that faces a $5.8 billion deficit over the next two years, and spending on most state agencies has been trimmed.

Family awarded $5.7 million in boy's death

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — The family of a third-grader who was found hanging from a cloth towel dispenser has been awarded almost $5.7 million.

A Bexar County jury found Monday that Steiner American Corp., the manufacturer of the dispenser, was at fault for defective design and was negligent for failing to warn of its hazards.

The Franco family was awarded $688,000 in actual damages and $5 million in punitive damages.

Eugenio Franco, 9, died in May 1983 at Medical Center Hospital.

He was found hanging from a towel dispenser at a restaurant where the family had gone for dinner.

At the trial, attorneys said what happened just before the boy died may never be known.

During the two-week trial, several theories of the boy's death were discussed, including foul play, choking and accident.

Project helps ex-convicts find, keep jobs

AUSTIN (AP) — Officials of a joint employment venture by governmental agencies said Tuesday they have proven that the best way to keep an ex-convict out of jail is to find him a job.

"We appreciate the help and we need it so desperately," said Pat McCoy, a former prison life term who is now director of New Directions, a halfway house operation in Houston.

Carl Robbins, who spent 27 years behind prison walls and now serves as an official of the coordinated effort to find jobs for those released on parole, said, "No single factor is more important to relieve recidivism than Project Forward.

"Without a job there is no hope for the ex-offender."

Project Forward is operated by the Texas Employment Commission, the Texas Department of Corrections and the Board of Pardons and Paroles.

TEC commissioner Mary Nabers told a breakfast briefing of more than 50 state legislators and others, "This is hands-on crime prevention."

Since October 1985, the coordinated effort has helped 2,935 parolees obtain and retain employment.

"It has saved the state $2.5 million in the past year," Nabers said, "figures that it costs the state $500 a day to confine an inmate."

The project has been operating in Dallas and Houston because of urban areas provide most of state prison population.

Project Forward director Snow said plans are to expand program to San Antonio, Waco and Austin.

The board refers ex-offenders to the TEC where they get counseling and job search training. Then they are helped to look for employment.
