Texas lawmakers OK bill allowing guards to use 'needed' force

AUSTIN (AP) — The Texas House voted Wednesday to allow prison and jail guards to use force against prisoners when necessary for safety or to prevent an escape.

Rep. Mark Stiles' bill, tentatively approved in a non-record vote, faces the more House vote, probably to be held next week, to the Senate. State law now allows peace officers to use force when they "reasonably believe" it is necessary to make an arrest, prevent an escape or protect people and property.

But most corrections officers, including state prison guards, are not peace officers. The law now allows them to use force only in self-defense, the same authority given all Texans.

Stiles, D-Beaumont, said that is not enough.

"You could have two inmates in the Texas Department of Corrections about to kill each other and all our corrections guard is going to be able to do is stand there and watch until a riot team comes," Stiles said. "And those folks really don't have the right to break up anything either because they are not covered under the law," Stiles said in floor debate. The House rejected Rep. Frank Collazo's amendment that would have made the bill applicable only to TDC guards and not to county and city jailers.

"I do not believe that we should be extending this kind of authority to 254 counties and over 1,000 cities," Collazo, D-Port Arthur, said.

"The problem that we are trying to address is within TDC confinements," he said.

"It's a possibility that we may just be creating more problems than we're trying to address," he said.

Rep. Allen Hightower, D-Huntsville, said jailers can find themselves in the same predicament — spectators to a fight — as prison guards.

"If a riot or a fight breaks out, they know now that if they go in there and break it up they are going to end up in federal court," Hightower said.

"So basically they wait, let the fight clear itself and wait on peace officers to come in to break it up," he said.

"There's no safety for anybody," he added.

Also Wednesday, the House voted tentative approval to a Senate bill that would make inmates liable for destruction of prison property.

The House also gave preliminary approval to a bill that, if approved, would exempt photographs of peace officers from the Texas Open Record Act.
