Mary Beth Whitehead to judge: 'Please return Baby Sara to me'

RED BANK, N.J. (AP) — Surrogate mother Mary Beth Whitehead, stripped of the right to see her daughter again, vowed Thursday to continue her legal battle for the child, saying she'll never stop loving the little girl known as Baby M. "Until Sara comes home, my fight will continue," Mrs. Whitehead said haltingly, with tears in her eyes. "We will not accept the decision of one judge as the final determination of a whole society that we should be permanently separated."

"We love each other very much," she said in her first public statement since Tuesday, when Judge Harvey R. Sorkow issued the nation's first ruling upholding a disputed surrogate parenting contract.

"I believe that there is something so wrong and so harmfully unnatural about the surrogate practice that our New Jersey appellate courts will return Sara to me," she said, adding that she will keep the child's crib set up.

Mrs. Whitehead named the year-old child "Sara," but since Tuesday's historic ruling the baby has been Melissa Elizabeth Stern in the eyes of the law. The biological father, William Stern, won custody and Sorkow, minutes after reading his 121-page decision, allowed Stern's wife, Elizabeth, to adopt the child.

The case, which brought worldwide attention to surrogate parenting, was sparked by Mrs. Whitehead's refusal to honor the $10,000 contract under which she was artificially inseminated with Stern's sperm.

The 29-year-old housewife refused to give the baby to the Sterns and, with police officers at her Brick Township home, handed the baby out a window to her husband. After hiding for 87 days in Florida, she was found by law officers and the baby went to the Sterns' temporary custody. The three-month trial ensued.

"There will never be a termination of the love I have for Sara," Mrs. Whitehead said, her husband Richard at her side. "Nor will there ever be a termination to the need Sara has for her real mother."

Mrs. Whitehead's attorney, Harold J. Cassidy, said the appeal, probably to the New Jersey Supreme Court, will cite at least 15 grounds for reversal. He said another law firm and two law professors have joined Mrs. Whitehead's case.

Cassidy said he first must block Sorkow's ruling and halt the adoption, the change of name and the termination of Mrs. Whitehead's parental and visitation rights to the baby. A hearing was set for Friday.

Cassidy said the appeal will contend that surrogate motherhood is "indecent and the worst form of exploitation of one human being for the gratification of another."

Sorkow's ruling said surrogate parenting does not exploit women, and that adoption has a stronger potential for abuse because of the risk of pressure to give up the child.

The judge said the practice is not immoral, and does not amount to baby selling because the father cannot buy "what is already his."

Sorkow said Mrs. Whitehead "knew just what she was bargaining for" when she entered the February 1985 surrogate contract. He called her a manipulative, impulsive woman who has trouble dealing with crises.

"He misunderstood so much about the needs Sara and I have for each other," Mrs. Whitehead said. Mrs. Whitehead said she was part of the $10,000 surrogate payment, but has not ruled out her movie offers.

The judge ruled that Stern, a year-old biochemist, and Mrs. Stern, a 41-year-old pediatrician, are equipped to provide the surrogate Baby M needs in view of her start in life.

The Sterns would not comment, but their attorney, Edward O'Connell, said he considered Cassidy's views "insensitive to ... a woman's right to make decisions concerning her own body."

"Mr. Cassidy uses the word 'mother' in almost a romantic and intuitive sense. Bearing a child, keeping a child, does not make one a parent. It is the willingness to assume responsibility," he said.

Slum inhabitants welcome Pope, stone police escorts

SANTIAGO, Chile (AP) — Slum dwellers thronged to welcome Pope John Paul II on Thursday but stoned the police who escorted him. Some shared his podium to accuse Chile's military regime of torture, murder and causing their poverty.

Before setting out for La Bandera shantytown, John Paul spent nearly 45 minutes with President Augusto Pinochet, who the pontiff has said runs a "dictatorial" government. Vatican sources described the meeting as courteous but would not reveal details.

Protesters smashed all the windows of two police buses that led the pope on a crisp, brilliant autumn morning to the squalid slum whose 90,000 people are plagued by drug addiction, prostitution and grinding poverty.

Helmeted riot police used their shields to push the crowds back. Witnesses reported seeing several people who appeared to be injured.

The scene was repeated when

For reasons that were not clear, the local church erected a backdrop on the makeshift stage that depicted wooden shack that hid the real ones.

People chosen by Roman Catholic priests were brought to the pope's side and spoke out against Gen. Pinochet's government to a crowd of several hundred thousand.

University radio and television stations carried the denunciations, but government television cut the sound during that portion of John Paul's appearance and substituted background music.

The pontiff nodded solemnly as Luisa Riveros, who is missing several front teeth, complained of "no money, terrible housing and having to get up at 5 in the morning to get a place in line at the (government) health clinic."

"We want a dignified life, but without dictatorship," she said, and asked papal intercession for political prisoners, "including 14 facing the death penalty."

John Paul embraced her. Others spoke of torture, burning and killing by the government. People in the audience, some waving banners that said "Pope, they torture and kill here," shouted "Bravo!" with each denunciation.

"I have listened to you with much attention, and my spirit is deeply moved," the pope said. He urged the faithful to "use all means within your power to banish from your country all the causes of unjust poverty."

He cautioned them, however, to "avoid the temptation to identify yourselves with political parties or positions" and said the church must "always maintain a clear ecclesiastical identity."

The pope's audiences in the slum and at La Moneda presidential palace were a study in extremes. Pinochet supporters gathered outside the palace and applauded while military cadets stood at attention.

Rescuers find 53 miners unhurt, 1 dead after fire in copper mine

MURDOCHVILLE, Quebec (AP) — Fire and smoke trapped 54 men overnight in a copper mine directly under this one-industry town and one miner died, officials said Thursday. Most took shelter in a lunchroom 2,600 feet down.

Some rescued miners said they thought the cry of "Fire!" at the shift change Wednesday evening was an April Fool prank, but then smoke from nearly 2,000 yards of burning conveyor belt began rolling through a 74-mile skein of tunnels in the Gaspé Mine.

A miner who survived previous accidents was felled by smoke that filled the truck he was driving down a shaft ramp. He died before he could reach one of the underground lunchrooms that are hollowed out of rock and double as emergency shelters.

Eleven men were brought up into the cold, gray drizzle by early Thursday afternoon and greeted by fellow residents who gathered at the mine gates.

Several hours later, rescuers were waiting for the smoke to clear before trying to reach the remaining 42.

Officials said the miners were safe in several of the lunchrooms, which have water, ventilation and radio telephones.

13 missing men, safely sealed inside lunchrooms at different levels of the smoke-filled mine, which is capable of producing 72,600 metric tons of copper per year.

Ange-Marie Kenney, a 36-year-old driller with two children, was the man who died.

His brother Jean-Paul was with him but had the luck to be near a hose pumping compressed air into the shaft. He was taken to a hospital suffering from smoke inhalation.

Officials said there was no indication of what caused the fire, which began near a conveyor belt at 7 p.m. Wednesday during a shift change. A resident of Murdochville reported hearing an explosion, but officials said a short circuit was more likely.

Wall Street scandals cause concern

Schools increase interest in ethics

NEW YORK (AP) — Business schools are intensifying efforts to instill ethics in students who will enter a world scarred by scandals, but some professors say values must be learned early in life and doubt whether proper behavior can be learned in class.

The heightened interest over business ethics was underscored this week when Harvard Business School announced it was receiving a $30 million gift to finance a program in ethics teaching.

Most of the money is coming from John S.R. Shad, outgoing chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, which has been in the thick of the widening investigation into misdeeds on Wall Street.

"I've been very disturbed most recently with the large numbers of graduates of leading business and law schools who have become convicted felons," Shad told the New York Times.

Other efforts on campuses include restructuring curriculums to incorporate moral principles, courses devoted to ethics and lectures on subjects from product liability lawsuits to insider trading on stocks.

"In the past few years, this has just blossomed in terms of being seen as a major issue," said John C. Burton, dean and accounting professor of Columbia Business School in New York.

At the prestigious Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania, ethics Professor Thomas Dunfee recently completed a major project looking at how business schools can integrate ethics teaching into all courses. Dunfee said the project has received widespread interest among other schools.

Some institutions, such as the University of Santa Clara in California, have special councils devoted to promoting business ethics. Others are weighing ethical testing procedures as part of graduation requirements.

Besides Harvard, other big schools have been endowed to finance studies of ethical issues. The University of California at Los Angeles, for example, has received corporate donations of at least $225,000 to develop a business-ethics curriculum.

The push for higher moral standards in business has spread into the high-school education system. In New York, for example, an annual conference on business careers for high school students will feature a speech on insider trading by U.S. Attorney Rudolph Giuliani, who also has played a key role in the investigation of the Wall Street scandal.

Business professors queried by telephone said the government's widening investigations of insider trading and securities fraud has been the most active catalyst for emphasis on ethics teaching.

But there is no campus crusade on teaching business ethics.

The debate centers around usefulness of attempting to instill in young adults with moral education. Some professors say they have a role in preaching right and wrong.

Besides, they say, ethical considerations can fade into irrelevance in the real world of fast-paced, cut-throat and brutal competition.

"In accounting, finance, marketing, some faculty have no competence in the ethical field, no integrity," said David Vogel, professor of business and public policy at the University of California at Berkeley.

"Business schools have a lot of other things to worry about, such as the survival of the American economy," he said. "Would I rather see people worry about insider trading or how to sell computer chips?"

Others contend ethics should be taught aggressively, at least ethical problems should be noted, such as profiting in the market from inside information, hiding losses on a balance sheet to avoid angering stockholders.
