Boudoir pictures attracting clients to Denton studio

DENTON (AP) — The photographer gives quiet directions: "Look this way. That's good. Just move your left hand back . . . OK? That'll be great!"

He works carefully and precisely, constantly talking and flattering.

The model is a little nervous at first, but she quickly relaxes. It could be any portrait sitting — if she had her clothes on.

Instead of street clothes, Laura is wearing a simple white teddy. The set is all in white with touches of subtle color: a chaise with a satin coverlet and pillows piled high, white drapes in the background, a delicate bouquet of flowers on a table. Imagine a romantic boudoir set in a forest of studio lights and watched by an omnipresent camera.

Thomas Judd works meticulously. He constantly adjusts lights and his model; taking just one more meter reading; then one or two shots; then a new pose and the whole process of adjustment begins again.

About two years ago, he began to get calls for boudoir portraits — intimate portraits women could use as gifts for very special friends, lovers and husbands. He did a few for friends and portrait clients and began to get calls from word-of-mouth referrals.

He worked out promotional arrangements with some area lingerie stores and began to get even more calls. After a number of successful sessions, he decided the Christmas and Valentine seasons would be the time to begin promoting the service.

Like many boudoir photographers, Judd is a little surprised at his clientele. He says the average age is about 30 to 35, and many of his clients are professional women. Many are married. Most say they want the pictures for a husband or a boyfriend, but a few admit the photos are just for themselves.

So far, Judd's clients have all been women, but he has had inquiries from couples and says he would do men if asked.

He and his clients seem to prefer the suggestive rather than the revealing. Many of his clients first want to pose in a swimsuit, but when they see his samples they realize that the lingerie in his photos is actually less revealing than most swimwear.

When he first thought of promoting this type of photo, he says, he tried the idea on the most conservative people he knew. When he received no negative responses, he asked his wife to talk to women where she works. None of them found the idea objectionable. In fact, several were interested in booking sittings.

Most of the clients so far have been attractive, Judd says, but not all have them have been exceptionally good-looking.

"I try to make them look better than they thought they could look," he says. He is pleased when clients tell him they have never looked so good before or when they say their friends almost did not recognize them.

"A woman wants to be portrayed like a model . . . like a star," he says.

He says his sittings usually take about two hours and produce 20 to 25 poses. The basic sitting fee is $50 with prints extra, available either individually or in packages. He describes his fees as moderate for Denton, and says his average total bill is around $150, about half the national average for this type of photography.
