Health center loses invaluable friend with worker's death

By Sandra Voelkel
Reporter

Texas A&M and the A.P. Beutel Health Center lost more than just a nurse's assistant April 21 — they lost a loyal friend.

After 17 years as a nurse's aide at the health center, Elizabeth Taylor, 44, died in Methodist Hospital after undergoing open-heart surgery in Houston.

Taylor had heart surgery several years ago and was at high risk when she was told by her doctors she needed a valve replacement.

Taylor grew up in Wellborn and graduated from Lincoln High School in Bryan. As a general studies major, she attended A&M as a part-time student from the summer of 1977 to the spring of 1980.

During the 17 years she worked at the health center, Taylor took care of about 21,260 patients.

Mary Scott, a registered nurse at the health center, said Taylor was a good person who never had anything bad to say about anyone.

"Other than just a co-worker, she became a friend to everyone who worked with her," Scott said. "She especially liked the students."

As a nurse's assistant, Taylor had various duties, including checking on patients, changing linen and delivering meals to the patients.

Scott said the patients would rather talk to Taylor than any other nurse because the patients felt very comfortable with her. She had a way of getting close to the patients.

"She was easygoing and spent a lot of her time talking to the patients," Scott said. "Elizabeth really enjoyed her work."

Taylor was always concerned about other people's feelings and families, she said. Students and nurses always came back to correspond with her.

As much time as Taylor devoted to her patients, she still found time for her church, Scott said. One year she made robes for the whole choir.

"Elizabeth's death is going to be a great loss to both her friends and her family," she said.

Cindy Bergenbeck, a registered nurse, worked with Taylor on the evening shifts. She said Taylor would talk for hours to the psychiatric patients and got close to them.

"The patients wouldn't talk to the registered nurses," she said. "They would only talk to Elizabeth."

Taylor really helped the patients and the staff never heard any complaints, she said.

Taylor was quiet, Bergenbeck said, and never bragged about herself.

Taylor often did special favors for the patients, such as take cookies and ice cream to them, she said. The football players especially liked Taylor because she would make sure they got extra food.

Not only did Taylor take good care of her patients at the health center, Bergenbeck said, but she also took care of people outside the center for free.

"She always went an extra mile for the patients," Bergenbeck said. "It was like she adopted her patients as her own children and treated them like family."

her own children and treated them like family."

Taylor was very sensitive to other people's feelings. She always helped any new nurse by telling them about the Aggie traditions, she said.

"Elizabeth really dedicated her life to helping others," Bergenbeck said.

Nancy Schlapper, also a registered nurse at the center, said Taylor was a very special person to everyone.

"I think people liked Elizabeth so much because she was a good listener," she said.

A few days after Taylor's death, the nurses forgot to pick up the food trays and were late passing out snacks, Schlapper said. The nurses were used to Taylor doing the trays and snacks, she said.

"People tend to take things for granted and don't realize what all a person has done until they are gone," she said.

Dr. Claude Goswick, director of the health center, said Taylor was a loyal and faithful employee. She was extremely interested in the students and they liked her a lot, he said.

"We will miss her," Goswick said.

A memorial service was held Saturday at the Salem Baptist Church, followed by a burial at the Salem Baptist Cemetery in Wellborn.
