tuition hikes without good judgment.

"It's a problem for everybody in Texas," Reynolds said. "I'm not sure it will even pass the Legislature. There is a feeling we ought to raise tuition. But even though the state has economic problems, so do Texas families."

Dr. Sammy Ray, interim president of Texas A&M University at Galveston, said that since A&M-Galveston is a special-purpose institution and has a high cost per student, there might be a tendency to raise its tuition.

The institution is in a unique situation because approximately 40 percent of the students are not Texas residents.

"It would lead to a decrease in our out-of-state enrollment," he said.

boards of regents," Hay said.

Reynolds said the Coordinating Board needs more power, but not in the area of enrollments.

"They don't need that power," he said. "How do you tell parents their child cannot go to A&M because of enrollment limits?"

But he said A&M has had a good relationship with the board in the past.

"The impact on A&M will probably be minimal, but it could have a major impact on other institutions," he said.

Royce E. Wisenbaker, a member of the A&M Board of Regents, said universities have facilities and manpower in place to set enrollments. He said the Coordinating Board would have to develop these.

"I doubt very much that it is a wise thing to do," Wisenbaker said. "We need our own regents to call the shots, instead of employees of the Coordinating Board."

frustration involved, Alders said, and they're the ones who will become disillusioned. He, however, was ready for the position.

"I wasn't operating under any delusions of grandeur. I already knew that my powers were insignificant at best — so I wasn't surprised," Alders said.

Royall said he too had enough experience in Student Government to be prepared for the office and avoid disillusionment. Sims said he thought he was prepared until he got the job, but then he was caught somewhat off guard by the politics involved.

But, although they describe student government as weakened by internal problems and lack of communication, none of the former presidents would change the position which Sims describes as being capable of accomplishing "nothing or everything," depending on the person who holds it.

Alders describes it as "a great learning lab, and a good way to provide student input, but nothing more than that."

"You need to know the limits of Student Government as well as its abilities," he said. "You need to know about your position — when to start and when to stop — when to turn on the charm."

"I don't think the position needs a lot of change. It's a dynamic position which changes with the person who fills it. The degree to which it's successful varies with the president."
