lated to Rodriguez's work with North and the Contra supply network than Gregg has indicated.

This official, speaking only on condition of anonymity, said Gregg "clearly was the godfather of Rodriguez."

"He's the one that brokered the introduction (to North), pressed him on him, said, 'Look, he's a great guy, use him,'" the official said.

The vice president's account said Rodriguez never mentioned the diversion of money to the Contras from the administration's sale of arms to Iran, and that there was no indication he knew of the diversion.

The vice president was aware, however, of the Iranian arms sales.

In Jerusalem last July 29, Bush met with Amiram Nir, adviser to Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, who was the Israeli contact on the arms sales, in a session unknown to most of the vice president's own staff and traveling party.

According to the Tower board's account, Bush was briefed on the arms sale and told, "We are dealing with the most radical elements (in Iran)... They can deliver."

that I've seen is the new Jack K. Williams Library," he said. "When I first came here in 1973, our library was in a classroom. Now this campus has a soul."

The move to the new library was scheduled to take one to two weeks and cost the university $10,000 to $15,000, Curley said. Instead, the entire contents were moved by the students and faculty in one day and on the next morning it was open for business, he said.

"There was a tremendous outpouring of volunteer effort to get the thing done," Curley said. "It was the neatest thing to see people working and saying, 'This is our library.'"

Bill Hearn, director of student affairs, said the library was a tremendous asset to the university. The students did it better than the company that planned to do it, Hearn said. They moved 35,000 books to the new library, he said.
