Apartments

find out about the University proposal to demolish their homes and many found out by word of mouth.

Hanks said he finds it hard to believe that feasibility is the University's reason for demolition. If the apartments are over 50 years old, he said, he doesn't understand why they are not feasible since they must have been paid for by now.

The lack of outside maintenance may have been what has caused the deterioration of the buildings, Hanks said. The regular lawn maintenance coincides with home football games and the rest of the year it is only occasional, he said.

Tired of waiting for grounds maintenance personnel, Hanks said he and another tenant borrowed a mower to cut down the tall grass.

Gerald Smith, associate director for business services, explained that the poor yard maintenance was due to the fact that the University wants to have money available for structural repairs such as plumbing and staircases.

"We have focused more to the structural integrity of the buildings, rather than focusing our resources elsewhere," Smith said.

In the two years he has lived there, Hanks said he has had only two maintenance problems, neither of which were structurally related. He attributes the University's attitude toward the apartments to the decision to demolish the buildings.

"There's nothing wrong with the buildings structurally," he said. "It's just their attitude toward maintenance, which has been shoddy. They treat them like junk."

Smith said in the next attention will have to be given to buildings' maintenance. There would be more feasible ideas with them in the future high maintenance costs.

As for the tenants, Smith said they will be moved as conveniently as possible. The tenants will be notified by a letter about relocation.

Although the development for the location is undecided, some ideas are to build a site with more athletic facilities or tennis courts.

the general population and the residents of Texas by doing clinical work on diseased and injured animals, which is incorporated into a teaching program for veterinary students.

One of McCulloch's greatest concerns, he said, is that the general public hasn't been told of the many benefits of animal research, so it feels the research is unjust and inhumane.

Nancy Speich, a worker at the Houston Animal Rights Team, says the group considers any animal experimentation unethical.

"We feel there are now many alternatives — such as medical models, computers and cell cultures — so we don't approve of the use of animals in research at all," she said.

Through animal experimentation, researchers say they successfully developed the polio vaccine, Speich said, but Shealso says this is false.

The original vaccine was administered to animals, and worked, she says. But when the vaccine was given to humans, it caused many deaths, she said.

"Research of the polio vaccine, which turned out to have an adverse effect on humans, also took many animals' lives," she said.

McCulloch agrees that animals appeared to have been used wastefully when the vaccine was being researched. But he said their use played a significant role in the basic knowledge and development of the vaccine.

Esptia says humane groups are well-motivated and their concerns over wasteful use of animals' lives stem from their genuine compassion for animals.

"However, there are some humane groups, in terms of their methods, that I don't agree with because these groups take the philosophy that any means and methods to stop the use of animals in education and research are acceptable," he said. "Some of these methods include breaking the law and infringing upon individuals' rights."

Basic constitutional questions still need to be answered about the rights of the researchers and the rights of the activists, he said. Animal lovers who are too emotionally involved with their pets, he said, cannot think rationally about the subject.

But there is a place for animal rights groups, he said, because there have been abuses in all sectors, not just in medical research.

These groups have uncovered significant incidents and facts that warrant some examination, he said.

In an issue of one magazine, the Pennsylvania Gazette, a story describes how a videotape of boons was stolen from the University of Pennsylvania's Ethical Treatment of Animals Laboratory and shown publicly by the group for the Ethical Treatment of Animals.

The magazine says the tape demonstrated that the laboratory violated governmental regulations.

The tape shows a boon placed in a kind of head which springs and gives the boons head injuries, she says.

One University of Pennsylvania scientist is quoted in the magazine as saying the animals felt pain because they were uncomfortable but the tape shows a boon squirming and an attendant hitting the animal on the head with a hammer.

Speich says that one Animal Rights Team member, M.D. Anderson's animal center.

"Some of the animals used at the hospital for five years used as many as 30 times," she says. "Our group got the boons to use an animal for experimental purposes only one time."

Saudi Arabia agrees to stop probe in gulf area for mines

WASHINGTON (AP) — Saudi Arabia, broadening its cooperation with the United States, has agreed to search the Persian Gulf off Kuwait for Iranian mines and has designated hospitals for American forces in case of emergencies, a senior U.S. official said Tuesday.

The Saudis will use U.S.-made helicopters dragging special sleds through the troubled waters where a team of American specialists is checking reports that Iran planted mines to attack tankers carrying Western oil supplies, the official said.

But a U.S. request that the Saudis permit jet fighters to land for fuel is under "active" discussion, said the official, who demanded anonymity.

Saudi will pilot the planes, pursued from the United States in 1981, with Americans making up the rest of the crews. The Saudis detect Iranian attack vessels they can strike.

Kuwait requested the Saudis in searching for mines and the Saudis are positive, the official said.

At the behest of Kuwait, the U.S. administration is preparing to put American captains on flags on 11 tankers carrying oil to the small gulf country.

About 250 commercial tankers have been damaged or destroyed in the gulf since Iran and Iraq began in 1980, most of them by Iranian planes. The U.S. frigate USS Stark struck by French-built Exocet missiles May 17 and 37 were killed.

The diplomatic sources, insisting on anonymity, said there was nothing "dramatic" about the Saudi decision. It was simply a matter of U.S. and Saudi interests coinciding, the sources said.

The House on Tuesday passed a Democratic budget for fiscal 1988 that confronts President Reagan with a tax increase while rejecting his call for more military spending and cuts in domestic programs.

The $1 trillion spending plan was approved 215-201, with only three Republicans in favor. Final enactment by the Senate was expected Wednesday despite opposition by the GOP minority there as well.

The Democrats united behind their budget under continued fire by Reagan. In a speech to a business group Tuesday, the president said Congress' plan "declared war on American jobs" because it calls for raising taxes by $19.3 billion next year.

Despite the tax boost, the plan would leave a deficit
