Doctor calls drug addiction hazard of job

AUSTIN (AP) — A California physician said Monday there is a growing awareness by professionals who treat drug abuse that narcotics addiction is an "occupational hazard" among medical doctors.

Dr. David Smith, founder and medical director of Haight Ashbury Medical Clinics in San Francisco, said many adult children of alcoholic parents are going into medicine.

"They don't drink but expose themselves to other drugs," Smith told the annual Institute of Alcohol and Drug Studies.

Smith, the leadoff speaker at the five-day meeting, told of one doctor who hooked himself up to a 24-hour intravenous solution of cocaine and called it "recreational drug use."

One reason for narcotics addiction among doctors, Smith said, is that they are not afraid of needles "where among a lot of people in our society the needle is taboo."

Smith said so many people are now abusing more than one drug that "the pure alcoholic is an endangered species."

"Young people are abusing everything under the sun," he said but named alcohol as the No. 1 cause of drug overdoses at rock concerts.

However, he said, often when parents are informed that their child almost died of acute alcoholic poisoning, their first reaction is, "Thank God he's not on drugs."

"Young people like to mystify drugs," Smith said.

He said a "new" street drug called "ecstasy" was first made in 1914. "But this generation has learned from 'Madison Avenue,'" he said.

"They take an old drug, give it a new name, say it makes sex better and there's a fine mile long to get at the drug."

Smith said there is general agreement "that a broad-based cocaine abuse epidemic has occurred in the United States between 1980 and 1986, the peak of which is not yet in sight."

"If you think cocaine is a rich man's drug, you're hopelessly out of date," he told the audience.

FBI places former Texas Klan leader on 10-most-wanted list of criminals

DALLAS (AP) — A former Ku Klux Klan leader and "ambassador-at-large" for the white supremacist Aryan Nations has been added to the FBI's 10-most-wanted list three months after his indictment for conspiring to overthrow the U.S. government.

The grand jury that indicted Louis Ray Beam Jr. said the plot combined millions of dollars in stolen and counterfeit money with plans for bombings and assassinations.

"I believe he is one of the most dangerous men in the world," said David Berg, a Houston lawyer who in 1981 and 1982 helped to win court orders preventing Beam from harassing Vietnamese fishermen on the Gulf Coast and from operating paramilitary training camps in Texas.

"I was just as surprised by Louis Beam's making the 10-most-wanted list as I was waking up this morning to discover the sun," Berg said.

Beam, who has "Born to Lose" tattooed on his left arm, now faces his greatest threat, said Mark Briskman, director of the Dallas regional office of the Anti-Defamation League, an arm of the Jewish fraternal organization B'nai B'rith.

"He's now desperately afraid,"

Briskman said of the man who has spent years escaping one close brush with the law after another.

As a charismatic Klan leader, Beam, who patrolled the Mexican border with compatriots looking for illegal aliens, is remembered as a fervent anti-communist who tried to assault a Chinese vice premier and a workaholic who established a national computer network for right-wing extremists.

As a teen-ager growing up in Lake Jackson south of Houston, Beam was obsessed by the history of the Civil War and the South and carried a Confederate flag, those who knew him say.

"We played Civil War, and he was always the rebel and always said the South was going to rise again," said Allen Borel, a boyhood friend who still lives in the town of about 20,000 in Brazoria County.

Blacks in Lake Jackson in the 1950s and early 1960s knew they had to leave town by sundown. The schools Beam and Borel attended were white and most residents were comfortable with segregation, Borel said.

Beam, in the fourth grade, boasted to playmates that he was a Klansman, and by the sixth grade he was trying to recruit like-minded 12-

League said, a group which isitors right-wing groups.

Beam in the 1970s was involved in the bombing of an anti-radio station and for shooting at Houston headquarters of the Socialist Workers Party. In 1979, Beam lunged at Chinese Vice Premier Teng Hsiao-ping as he was leaving his Houston hotel.

He became grand titan and the grand dragon of the Texas Klan in 1977, he launched Klan "border patrols" in South Texas to catch illegal immigrants.

In 1978 and 1979, he led a recruitment drive at Fort Benning near Killeen. Armed Klansmen from the Army later appeared with him at a rally in Euless, the Anti-Defamation League said.

The Klan in 1979, 1980 and 1981 entered a dispute between Vietnamese fishermen along the Texas Gulf Coast. Vietnamese threatened, crosses were burned, their yards and their boats were burned.

Beam in the late 1970s also organized the Texas Emergency Rescue where Klansmen trained in warfare. Beam retired as grand dragon in June 1981 and associated with Aryan Nations in the Idaho Parkdale.
