Denton blacksmith uses tools of past in creation of art

DENTON (AP) — With glowing forge and pounding hammers, the blacksmith shop gives a glimpse of yesterday. The designs that come from Paul's Forge, however, owe more to today and tomorrow than to the past.

"I do modern work, things from today and tomorrow and a little bit from yesterday," says Paul Matthaues, who turns out hand-forged crafts at his shop in Denton. "Modern, abstract designs excite me."

Matthaues pays tribute to the past with his candle holders, letter holders and ashtrays made to look as if they were formed from harnesses or horseshoes.

Those items, and his handcrafted knives, sell well at shows, but his heart lies with the modern sculpture he forges.

"I get my ideas from books from Europe and the United States, and not only books but the different things I see," he says. "An artistic blacksmith has unlimited designs. Take different types of metal and put them together and you can make anything the customer wants."

Much of Matthaues' work is standard forge contract work. He produces gates and window bars to order, hoods for fireplaces and kitchen stoves, racks for pots, chandeliers, and irons and fireplace tools.

He works with a designer and his forged steel, stainless steel and tempered steel — often mixed with other metals — all is designed for customer approval.

His love of producing one-of-a-kind handcrafted works keeps him a happy man.

"It satisfies me very much, to take metal and twist it, bend it and make something not everybody does," he says. "It's an interesting trade. I love to mix metals to make abstract designs. Different kinds of metals give different moods. I love to come to my shop. I love to design and be my own boss."

Being his own boss is important to Matthaues, who was born in Wenderborn, East Germany, near the Polish border. After World War II, Wenderborn was under Communist domination.

"I and my family escaped to West Berlin in 1955 and got free forever," says Matthaues, who came to the United States in 1971.

"I've been forging since 1955, too, since I was 15 years old," he says. "My father was a barber and there was a blacksmith shop next door. I didn't like my father's trade, so I went next door."

Matthaues started out shoeing horses and repairing farm equipment. He quit shoeing horses about 10 years ago.

"It's a tough living, especially here in Texas with the heat," he says.

Although Matthaues has to go to other states to get the coal he burns in the forge he designed himself and has to make his own tools because the types he needs are not made in the United States, Texas is now his home.
