Company agrees to tentative deal with UAW workers

DEARBORN, Mich. (AP) — Ford Motor Co. and the United Auto Workers agreed Thursday on a precedent-setting contract guaranteeing the jobs of most of Ford's 104,000 UAW workers in return for the support of union leaders for more flexible work rules.

The contract, which must be approved by union members, also would boost wages, pensions and other benefits.

Under the tentative settlement, Ford would set guaranteed job numbers for plants. Ford would also have the right to lay off workers on a temporary basis only if an economic downturn combined with a slump in Ford sales.

The job protection package would be the first of its kind in the U.S. auto industry. Previous contracts protected incomes rather than their jobs.

"We have a good agreement," said Stephen Yokich, a UAW vice president. "Truly, we broke a lot of new ground on job security. The agreement fully meets the needs of Ford workers and UAW workers elsewhere."

Yokich announced the settlement in the absence of UAW President Owen Bieber, who was hospitalized for a stomach ailment. Bieber was released from the hospital later Thursday afternoon.

The union next turns its attention to General Motors Corp., whose contract was extended Aug. 31 when the union decided it would settle with Ford first. Analysts have said they expect the UAW to meet stiffer resistance from GM over job security.

The Ford agreement "marks a giant strike forward in our ongoing effort to secure the jobs of our members while making stable employment levels a routine part of doing business in this country," said Yokich and Bieber in a statement.

The statement said the contract would "lock in current level units in all locations and will be a carefully defined volume reduction linked to market conditions."

Peter Pestillo, the Ford vice president who oversaw company negotiations, said "the agreement can work together."

Job security was the union demand, while Ford sought flexibility to make business decisions and increase the efficiency and productivity of production.

Under the contract, the union leadership would be urged to urge its locals to accept plant contracts reducing the number of job classifications and job work rules. Job classification types of jobs a worker while work rules regulate when specific tasks are done who gets the responsibility of doing out the job.

The agreement, reached one-half days after Bieber's death, would extend its expiration to Monday, must be approved by the union's 25-member executive council and its 200-worker Ford council and then ratified by rank-and-file members. Voting would begin within 14 days.

The contract would boost wages by 3 percent in the first year of the contract and pay lump-sum bonuses in the second and third years. Unlike previous increases, lump-sum payments one-time increases that are included in base wage levels. The wage of an assembly line worker averages $12.83 an hour.

Needless admissions to intensive child care cost millions, study says

CHICAGO (AP) — More than half the nation's intensive care units for children waste a total of millions of dollars each year by unnecessarily admitting patients, a study suggests.

One author of the study suggests the problem has been aggravated by an increase in the number of malpractice lawsuits.

The study, which appeared in Friday's Journal of the American Medical Association, said many doctors send children to the units not because they are in a life-threatening situation but because of the unit's extra nursing care.

"We didn't want to imply that physicians are intentionally entering patients into the units who don't need that level of care," Dr. Murray Pollack, one of 11 authors who compiled the report on the health-care study said.

But, he said, extra nursing care can be delivered in most circumstances in a different setting at a lower cost.

Pollack said malpractice could be to blame.

"We're taught from medical school and throughout our training that to make a mistake is disastrous... and one of the worst errors is not to admit someone to intensive care who needs intensive care," the doctor said.

Pollack also noted that "we have not developed — not for pediatric hospitals anyway — an intermediate level of care between routine care and intensive care."

He and his colleagues compared efficiency levels at eight pediatric intensive-care units around the country and found that half of them operated at what they called a "reasonable" efficiency level of 80 percent.

Efficiency levels were determined by measuring the number of days each bed in the unit was occupied by a patient in need of the unit's services or equipment available in intensive-care units.

These resources, which are designed for use in life-threatening situations, range from special nurses to breathing and dialysis machines.

Some patients were admitted to the units when there was no need and others were kept there longer than the study said.

Efficiency levels at the eight all in university or university-affiliated hospitals, ranged from a high of 89 percent to a low of 55 percent, Pollack said.

"That's simply too wide a range to believe that the inefficiency couldn't be improved," he stated.

He said the performance of regular child-intensive units probably slightly below the city standards.

Pollack estimated there are 400 to 500 pediatric intensive-care units operating in the United States.

He said researchers made an attempt to put an exact dollar value on the inefficiencies in the units.

Adult intensive-care units have about 30 times the number of beds that pediatric units have, the nation about 1 percent of gross national product every year, about $4 billion in 1986, he said.

"While the ailments of children and adults are different, it appears to be the same in patient behavior," he said.

Pollack said that while he doesn't know what caused such inefficient use of medical resources, he believes that the numbers of suits being filed against doctors will ensure that continues.

Foundation awards grants for minority advancement

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The Arco Foundation said Thursday it is awarding $709,000 in grants to 16 colleges and universities, among which is Texas A&M, to recruit minority engineering, science and business students.

"At Arco, we are particularly concerned about the shortage of black and Hispanic engineering students," said Lodwick Cook, chairman of Atlantic Richfield Co., which funds the foundation.

He noted that only 11 percent of the engineering undergraduates at California's 19 public universities were minorities in 1984-85.

The grants range from $20,000 to $50,000. Six of the universities are in California, three in Texas, two in Pennsylvania and one each in Ohio, Kentucky, Louisiana, Iowa and Washington, D.C.

Thirty-one institutions have applied for the grants.

The grants will go to Texas University, the University of Rice University, California State University at Long Beach, California State University at Los Angeles, Claremont University Center, University of Mines, Drexel University, Harvey Mudd College, University of Louisiana, Louisiana State University, Stanford University, University of Kentucky, the University of Oklahoma, the University of Pennsylvania and the University of Southern California.
