not only the nation but also private industry."

This designation would make it easier for students and faculty to work with people in NASA and other national space agencies, Vandiver said.

"It will cut a lot of red tape and open a lot of channels," he said.

Ed Walraven, director of public information at A&M, said the space-grant program is patterned after the federal acts that created the land- and sea-grant programs.

A&M has been a land-grant institution since its founding in 1876 and was one of the first institutions to receive sea-grant designation 20 years ago, Walraven said.

"This school was primarily set up as a land grant — to take research and improve agriculture and engineering," Walraven said. "The land-grant concept led to the sea-grant program. Now we've got the space grant."

Although there wasn't such a thing as a space grant in the past, he said, A&M has been involved in space-related research for about 25 years.

Vandiver said A&M has been interested in space research since the 1950s and heavily involved since NASA first started.

The Space Research Center, started three years ago, is one of the programs that would benefit from a space grant.

Oran Nicks, director of the center, said there now are 60 or 70 investigators involved in the research and about as many students. They currently work with $3 million worth of activities, ranging from gravitational and life support research to space transportation studies, he said.

A&M recently was awarded a NASA grant of $5 million, which was money well spent, he said.

Nicks said if A&M becomes a space-grant university, it will give talented students a chance at research and help them gain more advanced projects.

"The big plus is that the space grant would produce a greater recognition of the University's space research and would draw more industries here," he said.

Although Jack Devore, Sen. Benton's press secretary in Washington D.C., said there is no talk of a veto, Walraven said anything is possible.

"Congress has passed appropriations to set up space grants and to set us up as a space-grant institution," he said.

"But just because the vote is passed doesn't mean the money will make it here," Devore said. "That's the whole concept of checks and balances of the American Constitution — somebody could take the money away as well as give it."

"But it's a reality now — at least on paper."

bank will be responsible then for receiving additional deposits."

Rouse said a bidder's meeting was held earlier this week after the OCC initiated an examination of Western National Oct. 5. Only one bid for the deposit base — First State's — was received, he said.

First State will have the option to purchase loans from Western National as well, but terms are pending examination of the purchase agreement and the failed bank's loan portfolio, Rouse said.

Although First State has purchased the bank building, the purchase agreement would allow it to do so, he said.

"Typically, those agreements will include options where buildings, furniture, fixtures, inventory can be purchased by the agent bank," Rouse said.

Western National received national bank charter Nov. 1982. As of Sept. 30, it had assets of about $19 million. Western National's failure was the 43rd this year in Texas and the 150th in the nation.
