Hailed by critics and audiences as the finest work of Woody Allen's illustrious career, Hannah and Her Sisters is an exhilarating and loving ode to neurotic, angst-ridden life in urban America. Allen manages to combine deep poignancy and hilarious comedy as he explores the complex tangle of relationships within one family over a two-year span.

Investigator: EMS workers use, sell drugs

AUSTIN (AP) — An Austin narcotics investigator has told the police chief that 50 current or former employees of the city's Emergency Medical Services are suspected of major involvement with illegal drugs on or off duty, it was reported Thursday.

Narcotics Lt. Pete Taylor said in the confidential memo that information about drug use and sales by EMS personnel was derived from police informants, the Austin American-Statesman reported.

The investigation led to the arrest last month of three EMS employees on drug charges. At that time, EMS officials said they did not think there was a widespread drug problem in the department.

The 50 employees who allegedly were involved with drugs represent about 41 percent of the 122 medical personnel in the department, which in 1984 was named the outstanding EMS agency in the nation.

Fourteen of the 50 people named in the memo are suspected of using drugs while on duty and 10 are suspected of selling illegal drugs, the newspaper reported.

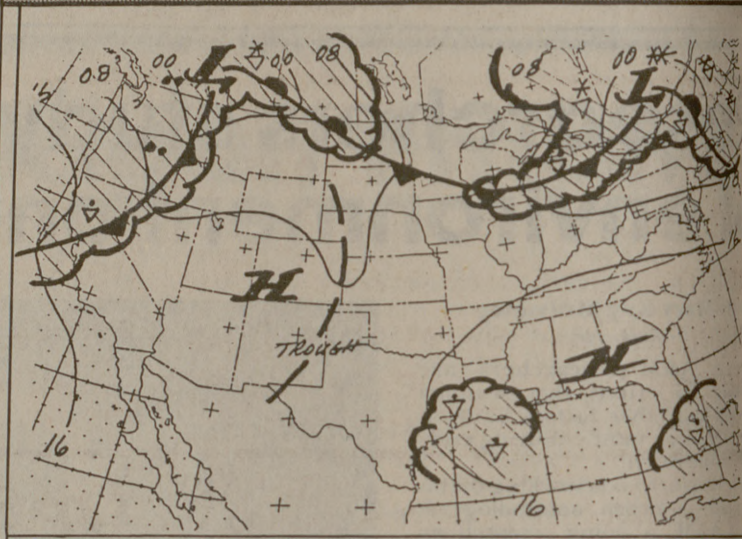

One EMS employee sold drugs to an undercover officer while on duty, according to the memo, which mentions marijuana, cocaine, methamphetamine, Ecstasy and prescription drugs.

In the memo, Taylor told Chief James Everett that police began investigating in August after receiving that numerous EMS employees allegedly "were using drugs . . . and dealing drugs on a small scale."

Bill Stockton, EMS director, said he was aware of the scope of the police investigation, but he said he has not determined whether the figures in the memo are accurate or indicate a pervasive problem.

"The allegations are very serious and I take them very seriously," Stockton said.

A&M multicultural director relays misconceptions of black history

By Drew Leder
Staff Writer

Jesus, Moses and Beethoven were black men, Kevin Carreathers, director of Texas A&M's Multicultural Services Center, informed students at Rudder Tower Thursday.

In a presentation commemorating Nigerian National Day, "Black History: The True Story from 1200 B.C. to Present," Carreathers said many conventional accounts of history are distortions that intentionally left blacks out of the picture. The history people accept is dependent on what version of that history they read, he said, and many of the accepted versions were designed to keep blacks ignorant of their heritage. Blacks who know traditional world and American history don't know their own history, he said.

The version of history he accepts, Carreathers said, places blacks at the forefront of many of mankind's major breakthroughs. He said many scholars credit blacks with the discovery of government, science, mathematics and religion — "the first gods were sacred black images that white masses bowed down before."

"The history of black people is the longest success story running," Carreathers said. "When we speak of world history, we are talking about black history."

Carreathers also said blacks have made significant historical and technological contributions in America for which they have been, for the most part, overlooked. Black men built the first clock in America, laid out plans for the capitol building, invented the gas mask and the fire extinguisher and performed the first open-heart surgery, he said.

"Blacks have participated in every single historical event that has taken place in America," Carreathers said. "There were blacks on the ship with Christopher Columbus, there were blacks at Bunker Hill, with Washington at Valley Forge, even with Grant at Appomattox."

After he spoke, several students in the mostly black audience questioned his claim that Jesus was a black man. Carreathers told the students they should seriously research the issue to discover the truth.
