Paper cites discrepancies in pastor's case

DALLAS (AP) — Former minister Walker Railey cited the wrong time on a message he left on his home answering machine 40 minutes before he reported finding his wife unconscious in their garage, the Dallas Morning News said Sunday.

Railey said on the tape left for his wife that it was "10:30 to 10:45" p.m. when he called, but phone records show the actual time was shortly after midnight, the newspaper said.

Margaret "Peggy" Railey, 39, who was choked on the night of April 21, remains comatose in a Tyler nursing home with little chance of recovery, her doctors say.

Railey, who has not been charged with any crime, cited his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination 43 times when called before a grand jury in July.

Norman Kinne, Dallas County's chief prosecutor, said two taped telephone messages left by Railey on the night his wife was attacked include "some of the discrepancies I wanted to ask him about before the grand jury." The tape was seized by police within two days of the assault.

Investigators have said they have evidence contradicting Railey's account of his whereabouts on the night his wife was choked.

At 12:03 a.m., about 40 minutes before he arrived home, Railey placed a 2½-minute call from his mobile phone to his home, mobile phone records indicate.

"If you want to, go ahead and lock the garage door and I'll park out front," Railey said. "It really doesn't matter to me. At this point, my concern is that you're safe."

Railey apparently was talking about six threatening letters he had received since March. After the assault on Railey, the FBI determined that all the letters were written on the same typewriter at First United Methodist Church of Dallas, where Railey was pastor. Agents have not identified the author of the notes.

At 12:29 a.m. Railey placed a 1½-minute call from his mobile phone to the family's publicly listed line, which again was answered and recorded by a machine.

Aggies don't always follow code of honor, students say
Student Senate aims to combat cheating

By Drew Leder
Staff Writer

The Aggie code of honor says Aggies don't lie, cheat or steal, but when faced with a choice between upholding a code or making the grade, some students say the code goes out the window.

"I have cheated," says a junior political science major who asked that his name not be used. "I've switched tests with people, I've copied tests and I've copied computer programs. Sometimes the tests are so hard you feel it's OK. It's unfair, but I feel it's necessary."

Statements like this came up frequently when students were asked if Aggies really lived by their code. While the majority of students who were asked if they cheat said they didn't, there were plenty who admitted they sometimes overlooked the Aggie code when temptation got the best of them.

In an attempt to combat scholastic dishonesty at Texas A&M, the Student Senate has labeled this week "Cheating Awareness Week" and will try to make more students aware that cheating does rear its ugly head at A&M.

Laurie Luikens, who is heading the Senate campaign against cheating, says the plan is to advertise the problem and to make students comfortable with the idea of reporting cheaters.

"It goes on, and a lot of people don't feel comfortable with it," Luikens says. "But they don't want to report it or even tell the people they don't like them cheating."

"It (cheating) goes on, and a lot of people don't feel comfortable with it. . ."
— Laurie Luikens, head of the Student Senate campaign on cheating

George Stott, chairman of the University Disciplinary Appeals Panel, agreed with Luikens; it does go on, but the extent of cheating at A&M is impossible to measure. Only one person accused of cheating appealed before the panel this semester, Stott says, but most students caught cheating don't appeal. And, of course, not everyone who cheats gets caught.

"I'm sure it's a problem," Stott says. "How big it is I don't know."

Murray Milford, former chairman of the appeals board and an animal science professor, estimated 6 percent of A&M students could be considered scholastically dishonest. He puts A&M's cheaters into two categories, the 5 percent who cheat occasionally and the 1 percent who rely on dishonesty to get through school.

Those students who fall into the "cheat occasionally" category usually are driven to cheat when they feel overwhelmed by their school load, Milford says.

"Students usually cheat when they're in some type of corner, when they're in a squeeze to get things done," he says. Milford says other students will cheat because they think they're putting something on someone or just want to take the easy road. In popular and media culture, cheating often is portrayed as acceptable, he says.

"It's easy for students to get caught in the pattern of doing whatever they can get away with," Milford says. "If they watch TV and read the newspapers it's easy for them to think that that's the way to go."

Students who have cheated agreed with Milford, but also added some reasons of their own as to why they succumbed to scholastic dishonesty. A common response was that some professors make classes much harder than they need to be. This, how one senior animal science major justifies cheating in a history class.

"The class was useless and the professor was unreal," says the student, who asked to remain anonymous. "I don't see any point in taking something that's that hard and that you don't need. It's probably not fair to the other students, but I'm mainly out for myself."

James Wallace, an accounting lecturer, says this type of attitude hurts everyone. "Cheating hurts not only the University, it hurts the people that are competing with the cheaters and equally, if not more, it hurts the cheater because he is going out into the world ill-equipped," Wallace says.
