Death row inmate waits, hopeful for second trial

HUNTSVILLE (AP) — Four months after a judge recommended he should get a new trial, convicted killer Clarence Brandley said Wednesday he was frustrated. He remains on death row but continues to have faith in the judicial system. "It's kind of hard to accept but you have to realize it takes time for the legal process to move along," Brandley said in his first interview since a judge last Oct. 9 recommended to a state appeals court that he be granted a new trial. Brandley, a 37-year-old black man, was convicted of killing a white man, Cheryl Ferguson, in an attack Aug. 23, 1980, at Conroe High School, where he worked as a janitor.

State District Judge Perry Pickett, who presided over a nine-day evidentiary hearing, said in a 47-page recommendation to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals that Brandley's conviction and death sentence were marred by racial prejudice, perjured testimony, intimidated witnesses and a biased investigation. Pickett's written report was delivered to the appeals court in November. Court spokesman Thomas Lowe said Wednesday the case was pending. Brandley's attorney, Mike DeGeurin, said he has no idea when a ruling will be issued. Both he and Brandley denied the death row interview was an attempt to pressure the court.

"I just felt it was time to come down," Brandley said. DeGeurin said if Brandley is approved for a new trial, he will ask that his client be freed on bond. Brandley's first trial ended with a hung jury favoring conviction 11-1. At a second trial in 1981, he was convicted by an all-white jury and sentenced to death. He has since had two execution dates. His attorneys insisted he was convicted because he is black and that white janitors present at the time of the slaying were immediately ruled out as suspects. Montgomery County District Attorney Peter Speers has said retrying Brandley would be difficult.

Probe: FAA did not give weather warning

DALLAS (AP) — The Federal Aviation Administration did not provide severe weather warnings to the crew of a business jet that crashed near Texarkana in April 1986, air safety investigators said Tuesday. The National Transportation Board in Washington said air traffic controllers acted in accordance with current FAA regulations but made no attempt to inform the plane's crew of the storms. The board said the FAA, in particular the Dallas Flight Service Station, didn't give warning about severe weather on the jet's intended route from Dallas to New Jersey. Seven people died in the crash. The board said at least two severe weather notices were in effect for the plane's intended route but the FAA did not pass that information onto the crew. Soon after the twin-engine plane took off from Redbird Airport in Dallas, the crew asked a controller for assistance in avoiding bad weather because they were having trouble with their radar. The twin-engine plane encountered severe turbulence, gusts and thunderstorms over East Texas. The NTSB's analysis of the weather showed that the plane, which was flying at 37,000 feet, went into an uncontrolled dive after encountering strong winds. The board said it would recommend that the FAA require air traffic controllers to broadcast severe weather reports more frequently.

Notice to Engineering Students

Physics 207 (3 hrs.) will be offered for the last time in the Summer of 1988.

Requirement can be met by taking Physics 218. (4 hrs.) In some cases the 4th hour can be used for free elective
