Restructured beef meeting demands

By Kimberly Green
Reporter

The number one factor affecting the average American's diet is taste, and restructured beef has won the "taste test."

Restructured beef, commonly found in various institutions, hospitals and fast-food restaurants such as McDonald's and Arby's, is a nutritious, low-fat and convenient source of protein that meets consumer needs.

Further processed meat products, known as "restructured meats," are formed from whole muscle sections, meat trimmings and finely chopped tissues not readily available to consumers.

Restructured beef has the distinct advantage of allowing the producer to control the content of the product, said Dr. James Keeton, associate professor of Animal Science at Texas A&M.

Initial research on the product was done because of a supposed shortage of beef and an interest in extending soy protein. Today, production is driven by economic factors, Keeton said.

Potential problem areas exist in the product's image due to previous frozen products of poor quality and a discoloration possibly due to oxygen tension.

Despite the problems, restructured beef has the same nutritional value of normal cuts. As a result, restructured beef can be incorporated into almost any diet.

The restructuring process begins with lean cuts of meat (fat cuts don't bond as well) and a particle size reduction by grinding, flaking or slicing. A small percentage of salt, sodium tripolyphosphate and water is combined with the meat's natural proteins to bond the meat particles.

The mixture is shaped by a mold or casing to form snack sticks, jerky, sheets, patties, steak fingers or slabs. The final product is either frozen and distributed, or partially pre-cooked and packaged for retail.

Letter: 5 men will die; FBI looking for author

LUFKIN (AP) — FBI agents Tuesday were looking for a person identified only as "The Peacemaker" who said five men will die unless the U.S. Forest Service removes its "armed camp" of Rainbow Family watchers. The threat came in an anonymous letter sent to law enforcers Jim Morphey and Billy Ball of the Forest Service's Lufkin office, and said the five men would die by the end of June.

Ball has been assigned to previous Rainbow Family gatherings nationwide, including one last year in North Carolina, officials said.

Calling the officers "brothers" and assuring them of "The Peacemaker's" brotherly love, the letter nevertheless said: "These people, whatever their lifestyle, should be free to camp in public forests without the fear of looking down the barrel of a gun. Are we in Russia?"

"You are going to bring about death in our beautiful forest, and I ask you to prevent this by pulling out your men," the letter added. "If you do not, mark my words, five men will die by the end of this month."

"Now I leave you with these words. You are the keeper of your brother; you are not his jailer. If you seek to jail him; he will rise up against you and blood will spill."

FBI Special Agent Roger Dunfee, of the bureau's Tyler office, said the agency is investigating the letter, but has no suspects.

"I really can't say much because the investigation is pending," Dunfee said.

The Rainbow Family, a loosely organized group of back-to-nature advocates, have met in annual "gatherings of tribes" of thousands of people since the early 1970s and proposed to gather this year in Texas.

The Forest Service has sought to prevent the group from camping in East Texas forest land for this year's celebration. The agency has also estimated that 400 members of the Rainbow Family were in East Texas forests on Monday and said that could triple by the end of the week.

U.S. District Judge William Wayne Justice ruled earlier this month that the Forest Service's policy on issuing permits for gatherings was unconstitutional. The ruling has been appealed by the Forest Service.

Meanwhile, both sides are awaiting word from the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on whether a permanent injunction against the gatherings will be granted.
