CS jam-goers find opportunity rocks

By Staci Finch

If the critics had their way, no one would believe College Station was anything but a ghost town as far as musicians are concerned. If someone isn't deploring the lack of clubs with live music, they are lamenting the fact that good local bands are few and far between. Well it's time to change that view, which is exactly what is happening with the Lippman

The Jam is exactly what its name says it is. It's a jam session for musicians in town, and it's nothing new. Actually it has been here since early 1986 and has had more than one

Brian Lippman, owner of Lippman Music Co. in College Station, said the Jam started at The Caberet.

"The owner of The Cabaret, Gar-field Scott, called me and said he wanted to start a jam night like one he had in a club in Bryan," Lippman "I brought some equipment in and it started from there. Lippman said The Cabaret closed late in 1986, so the Jam moved to Morgenstern's.

'The Jam worked well there, but it was a little small," he said. "In the summer of 1987 we moved to Eastgate Live, and it's stayed there." Lippman said the Jam has been very popular.

"When we first moved to Eastgate, the Jam on Wednesday nights was biggest draw, and the crowds would be bigger than those on the weekends," he said.

However, the bigger crowds brought a change in the Jam's setup. "It's turned into more of a showcase for bands rather than a jam session," Lippman said. "A lot of times people have trouble just getting up and playing with different people, because they don't know the same songs. They usually just play with 'Actually, that is really a help to new bands. They get a chance to play in front of their toughest audi-cal bands got their audience playing at the Jam."

Had Binion, a senior agricultural journalism major and guitarist for the local band Soul Survivors,

"Playing at the Jam has helped our band out a lot," Binion said. "Playing here first relieves a lot of the tension you might have when you get up to play a full gig. You get used to the stage, and a lot of people get to hear you.

But it's not just a showcase for bands to play.

Some nights none of the people on stage will be in the same band, and one blistering solo follows another. It's a great way for musicians to stretch their talents in a way they might not be able to during a regular

The Jam is a popular place to be on Wednesday nights, and, fan or musician, most people who go like the music. Marty Tate, a senior economics and psychology major, said, "First of all I like the fact that there's no cover, and also you get to see a lot of good local music. I really like the spontaneity. Sometimes people just get up there and just improvise and Scott Hoag, a May graduate of A&M Consolidated High School, said, "I like coming here because of the variety of music. It's nice to get to see four or five bands play in one night, as opposed to one

But there is more to the Lippman Jam than music. When musicians get together, gossip is as rife as in a beauty shop. Only the subject isn't about who is seeing who or wearing what, but who is looking to play in Musicians and fans alike keep up on new additions to the scene, or old musicians getting back together, and the Lippman Jam is the perfect place for the music grapevine to work.

A&M student moonlights at UPD

By Lisa M. Brice Reporter

Just after 7 o'clock on school mornings, about the time when many students are trying to prop their eyes open long enough to find a clean pair of jeans and make it to an 8 o'clock class, Jim Lindholm is just getting home. While others load their backpacks, Lindholm is dutifully unloading his gun and storing it far out of the reach of prying little fingers.

It has been a long night for this senior industrial education major, but it has been spent not at the library researching his last term paper, but protecting lives and property on the A&M cam-

Lindholm is not only a member of the University Police Department, as well as a full-time student, but his commanding officers and the College Station Kiwanas Club have recognized him as being the department's finest holm with the Officer Of the Year Award. Director of University Police Bob Wiatt, who nomi nated and presented Lindholm with the award, said Lindholm is the best example of what the University Police Department wants its officers to

"Jim has been a team player all of his career," Wiatt said. "He has displayed exemplary performance in all of his duties day in and day out. It is his consistency that earned him this award. Lindholm is held in high esteem by all of the members of his department, Wiatt said. His superiors depend on his consistent performance as well as the example he sets for other officers, he "Jim treats his fellow officers, as well as the people he must arrest, with the same courtesy, respect and genuine willingness to help," Wiatt said. "Officer Lindholm diffuses resentment by his very calm and respectful demeanor.'

In addition to his duties as a full-time police officer, Lindholm participates as a Field Train-
