Air Force chooses A&M as test site for software

By Mary Huron
Reporter

The U.S. Air Force is making software development technologies available to the public through Texas A&M.

A&M's College of Engineering is participating in a consortium that will test software programs before they are transferred to the public.

A&M was one of two universities chosen to participate in the consortium.

The Air Force's Modern Air Development Center is sponsoring new knowledge-based software technology for the Knowledge Based Systems Laboratory and the Laboratory for Software Research that were jointly selected as an "alpha test site."

Paula Mayer, research associate in industrial engineering and consortium representative for A&M, said the project is designed to detect and correct problems in software programs.

"Software is expensive to maintain, write and test, so given the opportunity to work with this program produces more reliable software at a reduced cost in a shorter time period," Mayer said.

Mayer said big businesses and two universities were chosen to research and perfect software and transfer the technology out to the public so people can start using it.

"This is state-of-the-art technology used in business and universities so students and researchers in computer science and engineering can become more acquainted with research in software," she said.

Mayer said some of the best minds in the country have been chosen to develop this program and A&M had to compete with many other universities to be selected.

"I wanted to get A&M into the program to increase our visibility and so researchers and students could learn more about these products," she said.

She said the program, awarded to A&M in April, will begin in October with the first training session.

"The project is designed to produce flawless software to make the computer programmers' job easier and more cost effective for the company since software is difficult to maintain," she said.

Mayer said the program will have an indefinite period until goals are met and then re-evaluated.

Dr. Herbert H. Richardson, dean and deputy director of the Texas A&M University System, said he was pleased A&M laboratories were chosen to participate in the program.

"Our selection as one of only two universities in the nation (for this project) displays the high caliber of research being performed here," he said.

First entrepreneur center in Texas to open at A&M

By Craig Sutherland
Reporter

The first center in Texas to study entrepreneurs and corporate ventures will open at Texas A&M this fall.

Management Department Head Michael Hitt said the Center for Entrepreneurship and New Venture Management will serve as a focal point for research on entrepreneurship, new venture formation and corporate venturing.

He said the center will be unique in Texas, although not the first of its kind.

entrepreneurs or," he launched a new business venture," he said.

Hitt said the center plans to introduce a newsletter or some other type of publication in the near future to disseminate the information it collects.

Hitt said entrepreneurship encompasses the creation of a new business, introduction of a new product or private investment in some type of business venture.

Basically, he said, an entrepreneur is the person who takes the financial risks associated with a new venture.

Interest in entrepreneurship is not limited to business students, Hitt said.

"My experience at Texas A&M is that we have a strong entrepreneurial spirit among all our students," he said.

"The classes we teach concerning entrepreneurship attract students from across the campus."

Hitt said the management department plans to expand the number of classes in the area of entrepreneurship once the center has developed.

Currently, the business college offers two courses: Management of Small Business Formation; and Management of Small Business Enterprise.

Hitt said Duke Hobbs will serve as Interim Director of the Center and hopes to hire more personnel as funds become available.

Funding for the center will come from the University and private donors, he said.

Similar entrepreneurship centers exist at New York University and the University of Pennsylvania, he said.

Action-packed 'Die Hard' more than 'run-of-the-mill' adventure

By Staci Finch
Reviewer

First Hollywood producers created action movies. Then they created Die Hard.

The latest effort by director John McTiernan (Predator) is more than your run-of-the-mill bang-bang-shoot-'em-up movie. Die Hard gives new meaning to the word action-packed with 132 minutes of the most graphic effects and breathtaking stunts the summer movies have seen.

Bruce Willis is John McClane, the New York cop who comes to California to visit his wife (Bonnie Bedelia).

He arrives at the lush offices of Nakatomi Corp., where his wife is at the annual Christmas party just before all hell breaks loose.

Terrorists (who aren't really terrorists, but just want to steal the bank notes in the corporation's vault) break into the building and hold all in the building hostage, except for Willis. Yep, you guessed it. Bruce Willis escapes detection and the efforts of McClane and the "terrorists" as they try to outwit each other.

Aside from the thrilling stunts and the graphic death of one terrorist after another, it is the humor that makes this movie. Bruce Willis' brand of dry humor made "Moonlighting" a huge success, but he's even better in this production.

And on the other side of the law, Alan Rickman is Hans Gruber, the leader of the terrorists. Immaculately dressed, and very debonair, his cool humor is a perfect foil to the sarcastic wit of McClane.

Especially funny is Argyle, the crazy limousine driver who picks McClane up at the airport. Oblivious to the terror around him, Argyle stays in the parking garage partying with a stuffed bear until the end, when he comes through in the clutch.

There was even a human side to this film, which was especially evident in the relationship between McClane and Sgt. Al Powell of the Los Angeles Police Department. Through conversations with Powell via a walkie-talkie taken from a terrorist, the human side of McClane comes out and provides another facet of this interesting movie.

This one's got all the stops pulled out. The stunt men must have been taxed to the maximum, as one terrorist after the other plunged out windows on the 30th floor and chased McClane under and over balconies and down corridors and elevators.

And the weapons used were fantastic. These guys had arms the United States Army hasn't thought of yet.

With all the action, adventure, love, humor, and stunts, 132 minutes isn't nearly long enough for the movie.
