Olajuwon injures KHOU-TV worker

cameraman suffered a cut to his head Tuesday when Houston Rockets star Akeem Olajuwon grabbed his video equipment after a reporter questioned him about a lawsuit filed against him by his former girlfriend.

KHOU-TV cameraman Jim Shipley was treated at a local hospital and releasedfor the small cut to his forehead and was doing fine, said Marc Watts, a sports reporter at the television station. He did not need any stitches, Watts said.

The incident began when Watts and Shipley went to Olajuwon's house at about 11 a.m. to get comment from him about a lawsuit filed late Friday by Lita Spencer, who claims the 6-11 center deserted her because he wanted a taller woman to bear his sons.

Spencer is asking for $9 million in damages on grounds that Olajuwon off the (basketball) court.' refused to marry her after she became pregnant in an attempt to prove to him that she could bear children.

Watts said Olajuwon became angry when he opened the door and realized a cameraman was with the

But Olajuwon ran after the cameraman and grabbed his video equipment, causing it to hit Shipley's forehead, Watts said.

Olajuwon went back into his house, and the photographer went to the hospital. Watts waited outside until some of Olajuwon's friends came outside and returned the equipment - minus the cassette tape, he said.

Watts waited a while longer to try to get the tape, but Olajuwon told him he had destroyed it and then left in his car. The reporter said Ola-juwon's behavior was uncharacteris-

'Something just snapped," Watts said. "I've never seen him that upset

Olajuwon told Watts he didn't want to comment about the lawsuit yet and that when he did he would call a press conference. Olajuwon could not be reached for comment.

The lawsuit asks a federal judge to bar Olajuwon from leaving the United States, claiming that he had "He started shouting at us and threatened to play basketball in Italy told us to get away," Watts said, add-and take his assets with him.

Steroid use estimates reach up to 30 percent off-season program begun last spring by the National Collegiate Athletic Association at 25 schools found nearly one-third of football players at some colleges tested positive for steroids.

"The range we saw was from zero to up to 30 percent positive at some schools," Frank Uryasz, director of sports sciences for the NCAA, told The Kansas City Star. He told The Associated Press that the overall average of players who tested positive was between 3 and 4 percent.

Steroids, synthetic versions of the male sex hormone testosterone. have been linked to increased sports injuries and serious health risks.

Last fall, only 1.3 percent of 1,589 athletes tested positive for drugs before NCAA championships and bowl games. Only seven athletes tested postive for steroids.

Uryasz said the off-season testing confirmed suspicions that college athletes are switching from oil- to water-based steroids to avoid detection. Some experts say water-based steroids usually wash out of most athletes within 14 days, so players preparing for bowl games have time NCAA officials said the findings, to clean their systems of the drugs.
