Court dismisses murder charges against lawmen

LUFKIN (AP) — Defense attorneys were jubilant Thursday over an appeals court decision clearing three Sabine County lawmen of murder charges, but prosecutors vowed to take the case to a higher court.

The 12th District Court of Appeals dismissed the indictments Wednesday against Hemphill Police Chief Thomas Ladner, 41, and Sabine County Sheriff's deputies Bill R. Horton, 58, and James M. "Bo" Hyden, 35, said Court Clerk Barbara Holman.

The court ruled that charges against the white lawmen, accused in the death of a black jail inmate, constituted double jeopardy.

The lawmen already were acquitted July 15 in Hemphill of violating the civil rights of the inmate, Loyal Garner of Florien, La. But the Smith County district attorney's office filed murder charges against them because Garner died in a Tyler hospital.

"It was certainly a disappointment to us here," District Attorney Jack Skeen said of Wednesday's dismissal. "We thought that we would be able to try the murder cases here in Smith County."

Skeen said he plans to appeal to the Court of Criminal Appeals in Austin.

The Tyler appellate court decision reverses a July ruling by 241st District Judge Joe Tunnell dismissing claims made by the defendants that a second trial would constitute double jeopardy. Tunnell ruled that the acquittal did not exempt the lawmen from murder charges and ordered them to stand trial.

"Of course I'm very pleased to hear about the decision," John Seale, who represents Ladner, said.

"I talked with my client this morning and I'm very happy for him and his family," he said Thursday.

Skeen said his office will file a petition within the next 30 days requesting that the Austin court review the case.

"The next step for us is to appeal the court's ruling to the Court of Appeals in Austin and ask them to reverse the ruling, which would allow us to go ahead and prosecute the defendants for murder here in Smith County," Skeen said.

"We could be four to six months in getting a ruling out of the Court of Appeals, but that's up to the court," Skeen said. "It could be sooner."

John Hannah, the special prosecutor in the earlier civil rights trial in Hemphill, said he was disappointed with Wednesday's decision, but added that it clears the way for other prosecution.

"I've been requesting that the (U.S.) Justice Department seek indictments against the men on conspiracy to violate civil rights charges," Hannah said. "This decision clears the way for them to proceed. Really, as long as a state case is pending, it gets in their way."

Garner's wife, Corrine, declined to discuss Wednesday's court action on the the advice of her attorney.

Crop dusters enable farmers to do more work

BROWNSVILLE (AP) — They fear they are a dying breed. Professionally known as aerial applicators, the old term "crop duster" is often used to describe their work.

Before most people are turning over to catch a last wink of sleep, the aerial applicators have already fueled their gas tanks, filled their spray tanks, taxied down the runway and sprayed at least one farmer's field.

During the heavy summer season, they are usually at work by sun up. Quitting time depends on weather conditions or on the number of calls received.

They say strict government regulation, has put many of them out of business. The public's lack of knowledge about the pesticides they use and how they are sprayed, they say, also contribute to their problems.

And this year's drought conditions haven't helped business, says Sam Muse, owner of Aerial Applicators Inc.

Rio Grande Valley crop dusters mostly are hired to defoliate cotton before it is harvested and to kill rice borers that infest sugar cane. At the end of the season, they do most of their work after rain showers to restore protective pesticides that have been washed off crops.

"We're like a fire department," Muse said. "We sit and wait mostly. After the rain, we get calls."

However, with the exception of the emergency-type calls after rain-falls, farmers are making use more and more of ground-sprayed pesticides, which are cheaper though more time-consuming, Muse said. One hundred acres that an aerial applicator can cover in one hour takes a ground rig about half a day, he said.

Another crop duster pilot, Van Moad, says he is concerned that the supply of aerial applicators exceeds the demand. "We will become extinct," he said.

Muse and Moad say crop dusters have a continual problem with drift of air-applied chemicals. "The laws are so hard to live with," he said, referring to government controls on applications.

"They (Texas Department of Agriculture) say there can't be any drift, but . . . it's a law of physics," said Muse, a Texas A&M graduate. He explained that the wind carries the strong scent of insecticides from air-applications just as it would if rigs were sprayed with ground rigs.

TDA pesticide expert Ruben Garcia agreed, saying drift from pesticides is prevalent.

However, weather conditions prescribed by the Environmental Protection Agency labels on pesticide cans are intended to limit the drift, Garza said. Certain wind speeds, direction and humidity factors must exist before spraying is legally allowed.

"The reason they sometimes get into problems," Garza said, "is when they spray when it's too windy or too near residential areas."

Farmers and aerial applicators, he said, find the stringent laws hard to follow because, for a long time, they were used to doing things a certain way, although they are now more aware of the dangers of pesticides. "You can't do away with the chemical hazard that results with the drift," Garza said.

He added, however, that despite occasional problems, the average crop duster is law abiding. "He keeps really good records as we (TDA) dictate," he said.

Muse said he enjoys what he does, even though the job is very hot, rough and physically tiring. "You can't set the plane on autopilot," he said.

And he insists that professional crop dusting pilots are not reckless daredevils.

MSC plans annual open house Sunday

By Lyneen Johnson
Staff Writer

Representatives from about 180 Texas A&M organizations will distribute information, applications and advice about activities on campus at the MSC Open House on Sunday from 4-8 p.m.

Groups represented at the open house will range from student clubs to academic colleges to religious organizations, Claudia Hoste, MSC director of external public affairs, said.

Maps will be available with an alphabetic legend of organizations and a sectional key to assist with locating specific groups quickly.

"People are encouraged to filter throughout the displays," Hoste said. "Financial solicitation will not be done, there is no pressure to join anything, merely to learn about what is offered."

Entertainment events will be held in the MSC lounge every hour including appearances by new President William H. Noble, TAMU and the Aggie Wranglers. Radio station KKYS will be casting live from the MSC.

The MSC Council and KKYS will offer promotional giveaways.

Kris Crenweige, vice president of MSC, said, "We want everyone to become involved and that's a significant part of A&M, let's make it a better place."

"We want people to see that is more to the MSC than a building. Hoste says that the extracurricular activities at A&M offer opportunities not found in the classroom.

"You can learn things that simply don't learn in class," she said. "Forming relationships, both personal and personal with all the people — these experiences with future endeavors."

A&M coaches aid national telethon

Texas A&M head football coach Jackie Sherrill and other A&M coaches will take pledge calls during the Jerry Lewis Muscular Dystrophy Association telethon over the Labor Day weekend.

KBTX-TV will broadcast the telethon live from Las Vegas, with occasional breakaways to local telethon headquarters at the College Station Hilton. The coaches will be seen on television at 9:15 p.m. Sunday. The telethon runs from 8 p.m. Sunday to 5:30 p.m. Monday.

The station also will sponsor a donation drop-off in Post Office Mall.

Other pledge centers will be Brenham, Buffalo, Frank Madisonville, Navasota and Searsville.

Other local groups will contribute to the telethon as well.

Reflections Hair Design will give $10 haircuts during the telethon weekend, donating all proceeds to MDA. KKYS-FM will broadcast live from the salon Monday from 1 p.m. to 6 p.m.

Food services has outdoor barbecue

The Texas A&M Food Services Department will hold a Texas-style barbecue today from 4 p.m. to 7:30 p.m. in front of the Academic Building.

The dinner-time entertainment will feature two live bands — the Texas Twisters and Neue Regal.

In addition to the traditional brisket, beans and corn-on-the-cob, the meal will include country fair desserts such as pecan cotton candy and snow cones.

Students on the board plan to attend the barbecue at no cost. Other students and guests must pay $4.95.

Food Services is holding barbecue as one of its special weekly functions. Other special meals will include banana parties and oriental feasts.
