Student goes from engineering to liberal arts and back again

By Mandy Mikulencak

Although psychology and industrial engineering degrees seem worlds apart, one Texas A&M student has combined the two to give himself the best of both worlds.

When Mike Traubert graduates in May, it will be his second time around. The first degree he received was a bachelor's of science in psychology in 1987. Now, two years later, he'll soon have an industrial engineering degree under his belt. Traubert believes his combination of technical and liberal arts degrees put him at an advantage.

"I have the culture, or at least part of it, and I'll have the technical training in mathematics and science that's so essential in this culture right now," Traubert says. "As an undergraduate, I'm getting the best of both worlds."

But Traubert didn't originally set out to get two degrees. When he enrolled at

A&M in 1982 after four years in the Marine Corps, he enrolled specifically in the College of Engineering with plans to obtain an industrial engineering degree.

During his senior year, Traubert became dissatisfied with the engineering program and changed his major to psychology, an area he'd always been interested in.

"I was losing interest in engineering, my grades weren't very good at all and I didn't feel I was getting the education I wanted," Traubert says. "It was nice to have this wonderful technical training, but there was no real culture in it."

By May 1987, Traubert received his bachelor's and went on to work at the Greenleaf Psychiatric Hospital in Bryan as a mental health worker.

Traubert didn't see very many options for him in psychology without graduate work, and at that point in his life, he had no plans for graduate school.

"I felt that to go anywhere in psychology, you'd need a master's or Ph.D. to do any counseling or real research," Traubert says. "And I didn't feel comfortable with doing clinical work."

That fall, Traubert made the decision to return to A&M to finish his engineering degree.

Did Traubert believe his liberal arts degree limited his career choices?

"In some ways I see limitations in both engineering and liberal arts," Traubert says. "It's like we're in isolation. One of the reasons we have problems with competition is we don't have a feel for where we're going—and we just tend to emphasize the technical solutions to problems. There is a broader view that should encompass both engineering and liberal arts."
