'Last Temptation of Christ', A visual, spiritual triumph

By Shane Hall
 Staff Writer

As you can probably guess from the furor around it, "The Last Temptation of Christ" is anything but another boring biblical film, ala "The Greatest Story Ever Told."

Martin Scorsese's controversial, low budget epic exploring the humanity of Christ is intelligent, emotional, and yes, spiritual.

Based on Greek author Nikos Kazantzakis' novel of the same name, "The Last Temptation of Christ" is not so much the story of Jesus Christ as it is the story of the ongoing struggle between the physical and the spiritual. The battlefield for this struggle, Kazantzakis wrote, is the arena of the soul.

The movie opens with a disclaimer stating that the film is not based on the Gospels, but is a fictional account of this inner struggle.

Willem Dafoe, best known for his role as the kindly Sgt. Elias in "Platoon," plays Jesus and turns in an astonishing performance as one who is both God and man. Dafoe's Jesus is one who is tormented by temptation from all sides and struggles in anguish to overcome it. An especially powerful scene shows Christ on a fast in the desert. He sits in a circle drawn in the ground as the devil, assuming the forms of a cobra, a lion and a burst of flame, tempts him unsuccessfully.

After this important scene, Christ returns to his disciples fully prepared to bring his message to the people of Israel.

Scorsese dramatizes several of the miracles from Christ's life: the raising of Lazarus, the wedding at Cana and the giving of sight to a blind man. Here Judas, ever the publicist, leads the healed man around, proclaiming to the crowd how Jesus gave sight to a man born blind.

The scenes of Christ's scourging and crucifixion, while graphically violent, are the most moving and emotional of any movie dealing with Jesus. Scorsese strips away the grandiose buildings and lavish costumes to construct one of the most compulsively watchable sequences in film. His mastery of packing a ton of tension into a short sequence gives such scenes as the nailing of Christ to the cross an intensity that holds the viewer in a deathgrip.

While Jesus hangs on the cross, a bent, mishapen figure, the last temptation alluded to in the title occurs. A young angel appears before Jesus, telling him that God is pleased and does not wish him to die. In the sequence, Christ is shown visions of living as an ordinary man with a wife and children. The much talked about love scene between Christ and Mary Magdalene takes place in this context. The scene is neither indecent nor lustful and it lasts about 90 seconds.

The temptation sequence continues as it shows Christ growing old. The film then makes a sudden return to reality and Christ's death on the cross. The crucifixion is one of the most astonishing scenes of the entire film, visually and emotionally.

Filmed in Morocco on a $6.5 million budget, "Last Temptation" is a film of visually impressive scenes. Scorsese's Holy Land is a barren desert, full of violence and treachery. Michael Ballhaus' cinematography is consistently fine throughout.

The film also boasts a harrowing soundtrack by Peter Gabriel and some great performances.

Dafoe, Keitel and Hershey all give outstanding performances, but there are some memorable cameos as well, including Harry Dean Stanton as Saul/Paul and David Bowie as Pontius Pilate.

With "The Last Temptation of Christ," Martin Scorsese has crafted a moving, challenging film that is a visual, and most of all, a spiritual triumph.

AIDS infected children face uncertain future in schools

It's been three years since Ryan White's highly publicized battle to go to school in Indiana, and three years since another child with AIDS quietly entered schools in Massachusetts.

For children infected with the human immunodeficiency virus, the same uncertainty remains. Some started classes with little or no fuss this year, while a boy in Illinois who has already fled one town faced more protests in his new home.

"AIDS Kills," said one sign carried by protesters in Illinois. "Help Keep AIDS Out of Our Schools," said another.

"We don't want to be in the spotlight. I don't want to be a civil rights activist," says Tammie Robertson, whose 8-year-old son Jason hopes to enter school in South Roxana, Ill.

In Lakewood, Colo., and St. Albans, W.Va., 5-year-olds with AIDS entered kindergarten classes with no fuss.

However, there were some protests in another Colorado school when parents learned that an 8-year-old who had tested positive for the AIDS antibody, an indicator of exposure, was attending classes.

Kay Pride, spokesman for Jefferson County schools, said state law requires school officials to keep the child's identity confidential. However, she said it is school policy to notify parents whose children attend the same school as a child who has been exposed to the AIDS virus.

The Centers for Disease Control issued guidelines three years ago saying there was apparently no risk within a classroom of contracting AIDS, which is transmitted by sexual contact, sharing infected hypodermic needles or receiving a transfusion of contaminated blood.

Of the more than 72,000 AIDS cases confirmed since June 1981, the CDC says not one was transmitted within a school.

President Reagan's commission on AIDS, headed by Adm. James D. Watkins, affirmed earlier this year that "there is no need to treat those infected with HIV in a manner different from those not infected in such settings as the workplace, housing and the schools."

"We've won all the cases. The case law is pretty clear, that there is no reason to exclude HIV children," says William Rubenstein, staff counsel for the AIDS and Civil Liberties Project of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Winning the case, however, isn't always enough. Ryan White won his legal fight to attend school in Rustonville, Ind., but gave up in the face of protests. Jason Robertson won a court order last school year to join classes in Granite City, Ill., but his family also decided to move.

John McCarthy, superintendent of schools in Swansea, Mass., presided over the peaceful admission of an AIDS victim in 1985.
