Midland County Warped flapping about bat guano

MIDLAND (AP) — Piles of bat guano in the Midland County Courthouse have residents screeching for removal of the animals and local officials flapping about the nuisance.

Colonies of bats have been in the courthouse for years, coming and going at will in their nocturnal flights to feed, officials said.

But as the numbers of bats grow, so grow the piles of guano, driving workers batty over what they say is a horror of stench.

"After this last rain, I got complaints about the smell," said Midland County District Attorney Al Shorre Jr. His office is directly below the space where the bats roost.

Donna Harper, one of Shorre's staffers, complained most vocally.

"I can tolerate the bats," she said. "It's what they leave behind I can't stand."

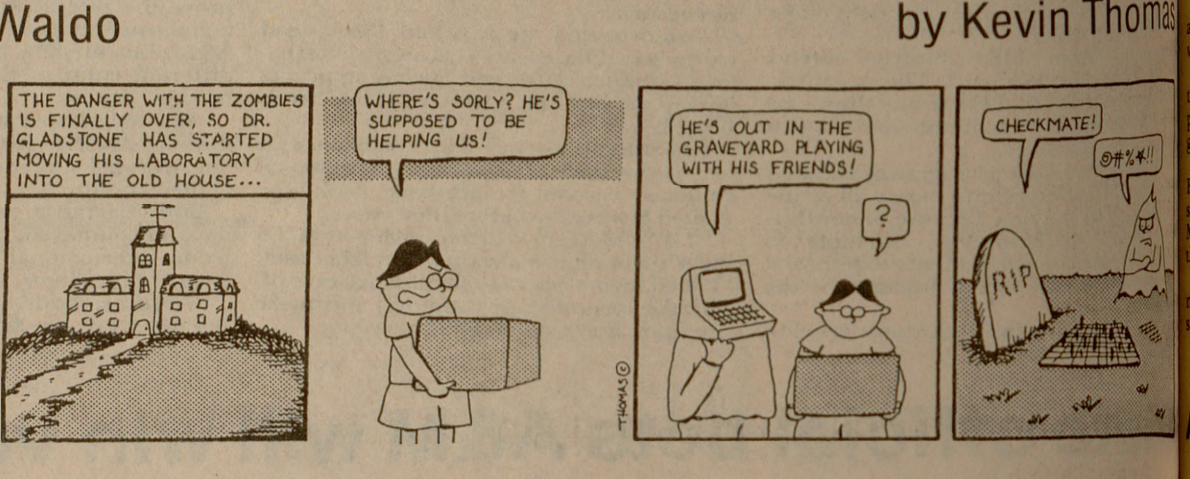

In their seasonal visits, the bats depart the courthouse about dusk in their flight for food, and return at about dawn to roost.

"If you want some good fertilizer for your yard, that's the best you can get," courthouse maintenance supervisor Gene Bishop said.

Quayle: Dukakis' involvements in group suggest liberal stance

AMARILLO (AP) — Republican vice presidential nominee Dan Quayle, continuing the GOP strategy of painting Democrat Michael Dukakis as too liberal for American voters, said Wednesday that Dukakis had close ties to a group that advocates deep cuts in defense.

Quayle said that the group, "Jobs With Peace Campaign," has extreme liberal leanings, the main feature being "radical" cuts in the U.S. defense budget.

On Tuesday, Quayle called on Dukakis to resign his membership in the American Civil Liberties Union, another group the Republicans have attacked in saying Dukakis is out of touch with mainstream views.

Quayle's latest salvo came at a fund-raising rally for Rep. Beau Boulter, who is trying to capture the Senate seat of Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, the Democratic vice presidential nominee.

Under Texas law, Bentsen is allowed to undertake both his Senate re-election bid and the vice presidential race. Boulter is trailing badly in the Senate race.

Quayle has barely mentioned Bentsen in his campaign swing through Texas. But he told Boulter, "We want you to be in the United States Senate this year."

GOP strategists say they want Quayle to concentrate his firepower on Dukakis, not on the No. 2 man on the ticket.

Quayle said that Dukakis was on the advisory board of the Boston-based group, which supported a 25 percent cut in defense spending.

Quayle said the list of advisers to the organization read like a who's who of the left wing of the Democratic Party.

The list of advisers to the organization includes Jesse Jackson, George McGovern, Rep. Ron Delums of California and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Dukakis' goals and the group's goals, Quayle said, was to cancel the MX, Midgetman and Star Wars weapons systems, the stealth bomber and to cut the M-1 tank, the type Dukakis rode in, by 50 percent. The Republicans have been making much of Dukakis' ride several weeks ago in the tank at a General Dynamics plant in Detroit.

Quayle said Dukakis had been more than an adviser to the group, testifying at a 1983 mock hearing launching "Jobs With Peace Week" and praising the group's aims.

"Yet now, in the midst of an election, the man from Massachusetts riding in tanks, claiming to support weapons he's previously opposed and generally trying to hide his past anti-defense positions," he said.

Quayle headed to Dallas for a fund-raiser and rally before returning to Washington, where he will prepare for his debate next Wednesday with Bentsen.

Earlier Wednesday, the Indiana senator had an upbeat message when he addressed young people at an El Paso job corps center that rated as the nation's highest in terms of placing youngsters in jobs, advanced training and the military.

He told the mostly Hispanic audience, "The greatest opportunities in life are still ahead of you."

"We are confident in your future," he said. "We are confident that you will be confident."

Plane crash still haunts memories

ABILENE (AP) — A year ago Wednesday the eyes of the nation turned to the West Texas town of Abilene.

Three officers were killed in a brilliant fireball over a Colorado prairie when a B-1B bomber based at Dyess Air Force Base in Abilene collided with a lumbering pelican. Three others parachuted to safety.

Many mourned for the three wives who were widowed and four children left fatherless in the nation's first crash of a controversial B-1B.

But many others wondered how a $282 million state-of-the-art war machine could be downed by a bird.

Accident investigators later said the 15-to-20-pound North American white pelican struck the supersonic plane like a bowling ball at the speed of sound.

With stinging criticism of the plane compounding their pain of personal loss, the men and women of the 96th Bomb Wing who fly and maintain the B-1B rallied around "their" plane as closely as they did the survivors.

One year later, the love affair between man and machine still seems to be as strong as it did before that warm autumn day.

Elaine Whitlock wasn't notified for nearly 12 hours that her husband, Maj. Wayne D. Whitlock, had been killed, but she said she knew it in her heart within minutes of the 10:54 a.m. crash.

She said she had a premonition two nights before that something terrible was going to happen. Then, she said, God gave her peace.

"When the peace came, I knew that meant the Lord would be with me, and there would be light at the end of the tunnel," she told the Abilene Reporter-News.

She buried her 39-year-old husband in his family's plot in his native home Tennessee on Oct. 13, one day after their 13th anniversary. Then she returned to Abilene to start what she called "the rebuilding process" with her daughter, Amy, now 12, and son, Scott, nearly 8.

She said the compassion shown her by her Abilene friends has convinced her to remain here.

Meanwhile, the family of the ill-fated pilot, Maj. James T. Acklin, moved from Abilene only recently.
