'The Immigrant' depicts Texan settler's plight

By Staci Finch

Immigration has always been the backbone of the diverse American culture that exists today.

Immigrants came to this country for economic reasons, religious reasons or simply for a change of scenery.

Many older Americans who immigrated tell stories of coming to the United States on boats from Germany, Scotland or Ireland, or of crossing the Rio Grande from Mexico.

Often those stories include the first sight of the Statue of Liberty, or of the first feel of American soil, and are accompanied by a tear of nostalgia at the remembrance of an eventful time.

The Missouri Repertory Theatre is bringing such a tale of immigration to Texas A&M Thursday night with "The Immigrant."

The play tells the story of Haskell Hareluk, a Russian Jew who immigrated to the United States in search of religious freedom. However, instead of entering the country by the usual New York City route, Hareluk immigrated via Galveston, Texas and eventually settled in Hamilton, Texas to open Hareluk's Department Store.

Written by Hareluk's grandson, Mark Hareluk, the play is based on fact. It follows the life of Hareluk as he adjusts to the American people and their way of life, and it shows how he learns to deal in the department store business.

The repertory company, sponsored by the Mid-America Arts Alliance, is celebrating its 25th year of existence. Patricia Meilrath started the company in 1964. It's now under the executive directorship of James E. Costin. The Kansas City based company has performed such diverse works as Shakespeare's timeless "Hamlet" and "Othello," the classic "Glass Menagerie" and "Nicholas Nickleby" and the contemporary "One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest," among others.

The performance is tonight at 8 in Rudder Theater. Tickets are available at the MSC Box Office.
