Nureyev will dance for MSC OPAS

Rudolf Nureyev is perhaps one of the best-known ballet dancers in the world. Making headlines long before Mikhail Baryshnikov was even heard of, Nureyev has been dancing since he was seven years old. His "leap to freedom" at Le Bourget airport 25 years ago electrified the world, and his dancing career has been in the spotlight ever since.

Nureyev continues to dance all over the world. MSC OPAS is bringing Nureyev, with his magic and charisma, to Rudder Auditorium at 8 p.m. Wednesday night. In this rare performance, Nureyev is joined by six principal dancers from the Paris Opera Ballet, who will perform many classic dances, including ones from "Don Quixote" and "Sleeping Beauty."

Nureyev has appeared with more than 30 of the world's major dance companies. He has choreographed many productions, including "The Nutcracker" for the Royal Ballet and the Australian Ballet. Most recently, he choreographed "The Tempest" for the Royal Ballet in 1983.

In September 1983 Nureyev took the position of artistic director of the Paris Opera Ballet, and has created new stagings of several classic ballets as well as dancing in his own versions of "Swan Lake" and "Washington Square."

Bentsen: Dukakis supports defense

SHERMAN (AP) — Lloyd Bentsen pushed hard Tuesday to sell Michael Dukakis as someone who'll support a strong defense, and he worked to deflect any harm to the ticket from Dukakis' acknowledgment that he was a liberal.

The Texas senator hopped into the cockpit of an F-16C jet fighter at the General Dynamics plant in Fort Worth, and told workers there the Dukakis-Bentsen team opposed the Reagan administration plan to reduce purchases of those planes next year from 180 to 100.

"Michael Dukakis and Lloyd Bentsen support a strong national defense," he said. "The F-16 is an integral part of that," he said, pointing to the Democratic proposal for more conventional weapons instead of more spending on Star Wars and nuclear weapons.

Bentsen continued emphasizing defense at a rally outside the courthouse in Sherman, where he told several hundred spectators that Republican commercials in Texas claiming that the Democrats were going to shut down defense plants were "absolutely untrue."

Bentsen, questioned by reporters, brushed aside suggestions by reporters that Dukakis hurt himself in Texas by calling himself a liberal. Most Texans, according to polls, consider themselves conservative.

"He said (he was a liberal) . . . in the terms of Jack Kennedy and a Harry Truman and I don't think anyone ever questioned their being for a strong national defense," Bentsen said.

"You know, what you have to look at and read is how he stated it," he said. "He talked about it in the terms of Harry Truman, in the terms of Jack Kennedy, in the terms of balanced budgets, in the terms of paying your own way."

Though the Republican administration talks about fiscal responsibility, it hasn't given the U.S. a balanced budget yet, he said.

Bob Slagle, the state Democratic chairman who helped introduce Bentsen in Sherman, said he didn't think Dukakis did much harm.

"I don't think it's really hurting him," he said. "They don't really attach that much to a label," he said, especially since Dukakis identified himself with Franklin Roosevelt, Truman and Kennedy.

But Reggie Bashur, the spokesman for the Bush-Quayle campaign in Texas, said by calling himself a liberal, he really hurt himself in Texas. Evidence of the damage was already showing up in tracking polls, he said.

In Texas, he said, the term liberal stands for the George McGovern, Jimmy Carter and Walter Mondale school of Democrats.

"I don't know what his handlers were thinking" when they let Dukakis say that, he said.

After Sherman, Bentsen was flying to Owensboro, Ky., St. Louis, Mo., and Carbondale, Ill.

Bentsen, a bomber pilot in World War II, clearly enjoyed the stop at the General Dynamics plant.

Workers chanted "Bentsen, Bentsen," and several employees yelled out in objection to George Bush's running mate, Dan Quayle, calling him a draft dodger.

There were also Bush supporters in evidence, but they did not heckle or disturb the tour of the mile-long plant, which manufactures about 300 jets a year.

Bentsen squeezed into the single-seat cockpit of a new F-16C for the camera and afterward declared it "fits like a wetsuit."

He joked to reporters that he'd fly it on the next campaign stop and meet his entourage there.
