Education rates high for Dukakis

Dukakis says that "no issue, no concern, no institution means more to me than education." He claims "the time has come for a national partnership for educational excellence" in which the president "becomes this nation's number one advocate for educational opportunity, good teaching and good schools for all our children."

Dukakis opposes tuition tax credits. In Massachusetts, Dukakis line-item vetoed a "choose-a-school" plan proposed by Democratic State Senate President William Bulger, a pilot program that would allow inner-city students in Boston to voluntarily attend superior schools in the suburbs.

Dukakis proposes the creation of a National Teaching Standards Board that would be composed of representatives of the teaching establishment and would set nationwide standards for teachers.

Dukakis opposes prayer in school. "We've learned that we can't improve America's schools by slashing resources or lecturing teachers or putting religion back in the classroom," he says.

In 1978, Gov. Dukakis vetoed a bill requiring teachers to start the school day with the Pledge of Allegiance. Both the Massachusetts House and Senate overrode his veto and the law was duly enacted.

Bush expresses opinions about education

George Bush says, "I want to be known as the 'Education President.'" He wants the federal government to increase spending for education by at least $600 million, mostly in the form of block grants to go to the states. He believes this is more effective than running federal programs, that the states are better able to experiment and to innovate.

The vice president proposes the creation of a "College Savings Bond" to help families save for college. Parents will earn interest tax-free if these funds are used for college.

Bush says the federal government should "provide greater choice" in education. "Tuition tax credits (for parents who pay private school tuition) are one way to achieve that," he said.

Bush supports merit pay and proposes that it be administered by local officials using funds from an existing federal program.

As a Texas congressman in the 1970s,

Bush co-sponsored the "Prayer in School" Amendment. He said, "I favor voluntary prayer in school as an extension of our commitment to teaching values."

Bush supports saying the Pledge of Allegiance in public school classrooms. "Should public school teachers be required to lead our children in the Pledge of Allegiance? My opponent says no, but I say yes," he said.
