Court will rule if row inmates can get lawyers

The high court has agreed to hear a Virginia case and could decide that states must provide lawyers to death row prisoners during the second phase of their dious delays in death penalty appeals delays that are increasingly coming un-

James B. Sales of Houston, president of the State Bar of Texas, made the estimation that it costs $200,000 to fund each indigent death row prisoner's appeal from state district court all the way to the Supreme Court — with roughly half of that money spent on state appeals
