Investigation launched into antelope trappings on land near El Paso

AUSTIN (AP) — Investigations have begun into a possible violation of federal law during an antelope trapping operation in West Texas, officials said.

Charles Allen, Texas Parks and Wildlife Department wildlife division director, manned the net gun in a helicopter that may have crossed the border into New Mexico in pursuit of three antelope during a capture procedure Jan. 30, the Austin American-Statesman reported Sunday.

TPWD Executive Director Charles D. Travis said he had retained a former Texas Ranger to head an independent investigation of the incident, which might constitute a violation of the Lacey Act. He said federal officials in the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's regional office in Albuquerque, N.M., are also investigating.

The Lacey Act prohibits the transfer of unlawfully obtained animals or animal parts across state lines or national boundaries. Penalties can involve stiff fines and jail terms.

"If it is a Lacey Act violation, that's a federal offense, and any type of criminal prosecution would be up to them," Travis said.

Investigators are looking into whether the aircraft actually crossed into New Mexico to capture the antelope, which later were released on the Lado Ranch near Van Horn, and whether the action was deliberate.

"Anybody can make a mistake," Travis said. "I don't necessarily think so (that the violation was deliberate), but that's what I'm trying to find out."

The antelope capture was conducted on the Cornudas Ranch, University of Texas land half east of El Paso and lying against southern New Mexico border. "It's hard to tell from up there if we crossed the border," Travis said.

During helicopter trapping procedures, the pilot maneuvers the net into position above the quarry and a gunner can fire a specially built net gun. A "mugger" is placed on the ground to blindfold and restrain the animal, then place it in a bag and transport staging area.

Charles Winkler, big game program director, said the capture was routine stocking operation to meet 1987 landowner request for antelope on the Lado Ranch.

"We inspected it and found it had about 10,000 acres of suitable habitat," Winkler said.

Travis said a number of TPWD staff on the ground took part in handling, loading and transporting the 40 antelope that were moved.

Allen was the net gunner on board a helicopter hired by the landowner for the operation, along with the independent pilot of the craft and at least one TPWD staff member, he said.
