1,000 refugees line up at INS to file for asylum

BAYVIEW (AP) — More than 1,000 Central Americans formed a half-mile-long line Wednesday outside a rural Immigration and Naturalization Service detention center where the INS moved a political asylum processing office in southern Texas.

Hundreds camped out overnight in a plowed field near the minimum-security Port Isabel Service Processing Center for early places in line. Several hundred more showed up by mid-morning.

It was their first chance to file for political asylum since the INS temporarily was evicted Friday from its Harlingen asylum-processing office because of alleged health and fire code violations.

"This tremendous line here represents a large number of Central Americans flooding into the Rio Grande Valley, and we just can't continue like this," Omer G. Sewell, INS district director in Harlingen, said while walking the line of immigrants Wednesday morning in eastern Cameron County.

"I'm fleeing from military service," Henry Torres, a 27-year-old Nicaraguan, said as he waited in line after camping overnight near the 347-acre federal facility. "A communist country is no good."

Douglas Herrera, a 24-year-old El Salvadoran, said he had no fear of entering the double-fenced immigration prison where 411 aliens were under detention awaiting deportation proceedings, because "they (INS) promised to help us."

The detention center is near the unincorporated community of Bayview, just south of the Laguna Atascosa National Wildlife Refuge and 15 miles northeast of the border city of Brownsville.

Taxis, vans and cars carried many of the immigrants to the rural center.

Border Patrol agents at nearby rural intersections stopped various vehicles en route to the new asylum center.

Inside the center, processing of the applicants appeared to be flowing smoothly as groups of 50 were bused past the security checkpoint and seated under a green U.S. Army tent where they waited to see adjudicators.
