Supreme Court allows Texas to argue claim for lost money

AUSTIN (AP) — The U.S. Supreme Court on Tuesday gave Texas the OK to argue its case over unclaimed money taken by New York, a battle Texas officials said could mean tens of millions of dollars for the state.
"We will have the possibility to litigate over hundreds of millions of dollars," said Attorney General Jim Mattox. "We don't know how much exactly, but there's more than one pot of money we're seeking access to. It could be a very large amount."
The Supreme Court allowed Texas to intervene in a multimillion-dollar battle between Delaware and New York over unclaimed dividend and interest payments on securities such as stocks and bonds.
At issue are payments that have no known owner. That money is being held by brokerage firms in New York, and the state of New York gets the unclaimed funds after three years.
Delaware argues that New York shouldn't be allowed to collect the funds because most brokerage houses are incorporated in Delaware.
Texas argues that unclaimed interest and dividend payments originating from companies or government bodies located in Texas should be paid to Texas.
"This money, which rightfully belongs to Texas, has been held by the state of New York," Treasurer Ann Richards said.
"It is our position that the only known factor in the whole transaction or series of transactions is where the money originated," she said.
The Supreme Court on Tuesday granted Mattox request to intervene. Justices last May agreed to settle the dispute without it first having been heard in some lower court because the case is one between states, Mattox said.
Every year, brokerage firms recover up to $2 billion each in dividend and interest payments for people who cannot be located.
All states have so-called "escheat" laws which provide that such abandoned money goes into the state treasury after remaining unclaimed for a specified period of time.
"We are saying that — where we cannot determine the exact address of the real beneficiary of that money — it ought to go to the home state of the corporation that originally issued either the stock or the bonds," Mattox said.
The lawsuit involves money collected by New York over the last 10 years. Richards said that the Supreme Court's decision also will give Texas officials access to New York's unclaimed property files, something New York officials have refused to allow in the past.
Mattox said he is optimistic about the Texas case.

Arbitrator rules for reinstatement of policeman accused of misconduct

HOUSTON (AP) — In an admittedly ambivalent ruling, an arbitrator ordered the reinstatement, without back pay, of a Houston police officer fired for allegedly fondling a woman he pulled over in northeast Houston.
The ruling angered Police Chief Lee P. Brown, who has had a number of his firings overturned by arbitrators recently. He called for abolishment of the arbitration system for city employees.
Officer Ernest R. Cooper was fired last April after a woman charged he followed her July 26, 1987, from the central police station, where her husband was in custody, and fondled her while promising to help get her husband released from jail.
In granting Cooper's reinstatement, arbitrator Walter D. McCoy wrote, "It is important to point out that while the indefinite suspension will be rescinded, the arbitrator is not fully convinced that the total behavior of (Cooper) was within the scope of good conduct and I do not feel that such behavior should be viewed with impunity."
However, McCoy wrote, Cooper's firing "was not based on just and sufficient cause," and that his grievance "is upheld in part and denied in part."
The disciplinary action was ordered stricken from Cooper's personnel records.
Cooper allegedly stopped the woman for driving with her head lights on high-beam. She complained that the officer took her to his patrol car and questioned and searched her, fondling her.
Police computer records confirmed that Cooper stopped the woman and placed her in his car. However, he denied putting his hands on her in any way.
The woman later presented investigators a telephone number she said the officer gave her with instructions to call him the next day. The number was traced to Cooper's home, according to arbitration documents.
McCoy said the woman's complaint might have been motivated by anger at police for jailing her husband.
Brown called the arbitration system "an erosion of our ability to maintain discipline."
