Alaskan oil spill prompts fishermen to seek lost income

VALDEZ, Alaska (AP) — Fishermen fearing lost income from the nation's biggest oil spill sought compensation Sunday as Alaska's governor prepared to declare once-pristine Prince William Sound a disaster area.

"We're not ready to absorb any loss," said Riki Ott, spokesman for United Fishermen of Alaska. "We expect full compensation."

Exxon Shipping Co. scheduled a meeting Sunday between fishermen and a company claims officer.

Meanwhile, the toll on the sound's abundant wildlife began to mount as efforts continued to clean up the crude oil. The Coast Guard said the slick and patches of oil separated from it were spread over 50 square miles.

Department of Interior spokesman Pamela Bergmann said a wildlife specialist sailed in the sound Saturday and observed 75 ducks and two otters coated with oil. They could not be captured for cleaning, she said.

Gov. Steve Cowper planned to declare the area a disaster, and pass on a disaster declaration request to President Bush, said Terence O'Malley, Cowper's deputy press secretary.

The 987-foot tanker Exxon Valdez, carrying 1.2 million barrels of North Slope crude oil loaded at Valdez, ran onto a reef 25 miles from the port early Friday after swinging out of a traffic lane to avoid ice. Valdez is at the southern end of the 800-mile Alaska oil pipeline.

Estimates put the spill at 240,000 barrels of oil, or about 10.1 million gallons, making it the biggest U.S. spill on record. The only larger oil-related accident in U.S. waters was the spilling and burning of up to 10.7 million gallons of oil when two ships collided in Galveston Bay in 1979.

More than four miles of floating boom had been placed in an effort to contain the oil, the Coast Guard said Sunday. An additional 3,000 feet was to be deployed at Galena Bay at the request of fishermen. Skimming boats worked to remove the oil.

The transfer of oil remaining aboard the Exxon Valdez to the Exxon Baton Rouge resumed late Saturday. The Coast guard said about 84,000 gallons of oil an hour was being transferred; at that rate, the unloading could take seven days.

About 11,000 barrels of oil was removed Saturday, but pumping was halted quickly because more oil was leaking.

Tests were under way to determine if dispersal chemicals should be used despite the potential for environmental damage. The agents need wave action to help break up the thick crude oil. Weather had been calm since the accident, but the National Weather Service said the wind was expected to increase to 25 mph and stir up a 5- to 6-foot chop on the sound.

Waves may make it more difficult to skim oil off the water, said Coast Guard Lt. Ed Wieliczkiwicz.

Foreclosures down, rent up in Houston

HOUSTON (AP) — Retail rental rates were up and foreclosures were down last year as conditions improved for Houston shopping center owners.

"Everything is pointing in the upward direction," said Gary Cairns of Revac, a Houston real estate research firm.

Revac reported that foreclosures of Houston shopping centers dropped nearly 50 percent last year. Foreclosures, or the sale of centers in lieu of foreclosure, declined from 123 in 1987 to 66 in 1988, Revac said.

"Increased investor activity coupled with Houston's improving economy points to a brighter picture overall for Houston-area shopping centers in 1989," Cairns said in a summary of Revac's 1989 retail survey.

Revac said eight centers, with a total of 1.3 million square feet, were constructed in 1988, a 78 percent increase over 1987. Six centers totaling 985,822 square feet were under construction as of Jan. 1.

Revac reported that 77.6 percent of Houston's shopping center space was occupied at the end of 1988, a slight improvement over occupancy rates at mid-1988.
