Remote sub disappears, stumps scientists

BOSTON (AP) — The team that used an unmanned submersible to explore the Titanic wreckage tried Thursday to raise the robot's younger brother, which sank in choppy seas during its debut mission. Jason, as the 7-foot long remote-operated submersible has been dubbed, was scheduled to be the star of the show Monday, when student audiences in 13 North American cities were to gather at local museums to watch via satellite hookup as the robot explored the ruins of a Roman ship wrecked off the coast of Italy in 300 A.D.

Jason is a propeller-driven remote submersible that glides along the ocean floor at speeds up to 1 mph. The vehicle is equipped with a video camera and two arms capable of lifting, pushing, pulling and grasping. Jason, still in its 8,000-pound mobile garage, Argos disappeared as engineers at Turner Broadcasting Systems Inc. in Atlanta were coordinating with control centers at 12 science museums in the United States and one in Canada. The crew was lowering the $1 million exploration team into 2,100 feet of water when suddenly marine biologists began scratching their heads and conferring off-camera. The frayed cable came up and the crew appeared first shocked and then ashen. A spokesman, Shelley Lauzon, at Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution brushed off the incident Thursday.

However, when museum officials, teachers and technicians tuned in Wednesday to test the $7 million communications hookup, they were stunned to see scientists aboard the support ship Star Hercules holding the severed cord that had been Jason's lifeline.
