FAA calls for bomb detectors at airports

WASHINGTON (AP) — The government issued a draft rule Thursday that would require airlines to install bomb detectors capable of spotting plastic explosives in checked baggage at 40 U.S. and foreign airports.

The Federal Aviation Administration did not list the airports where units are to be required, although it said the first one is expected to be in service at John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York by the end of the month, before the requirement takes effect.

A second is to be placed at London's Gatwick Airport, the FAA said.

Transportation Secretary Samuel Skinner said in April he would issue such a directive in response to the December 21 bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Scotland that killed 270 people. Investigators concluded the bomb was a plastic explosive hidden in luggage, although the not determined who planted it.

Congress has been considering legislation which would have the government pay for the which could cost from $750,000 to $1 million each. Several might be needed at larger airports.

The rule requiring the sophisticated detectors is scheduled to go into effect at the August, FAA spokesman John Leyden said.

Rescue

other alternatives, such as adoption.

Moses credited the "rescue" movement to the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on Roe v. Wade, which recognized a woman's constitutional right to an abortion. He said a small group of people were so enraged with the ruling they began protesting in front of abortion clinics, often getting arrested.

"They were outraged at the decision and decided if they couldn't stop the abortions, at least they could suffer for the children," he said. "For 15 years, groups were small. There were 20 rescuers at the start, now there's 57,000 people who have exposed themselves to arrest."

The Supreme Court ruled July 3 that states are free to impose more restrictions on abortion, fueling the conflict between pro-life and pro-choice forces.

The Court's ruling is considered a victory for the anti-abortion movement, but Moses said it will take more than politics to eradicate abortion.

"It was a gigantic victory, but still 16,000 children are dead this week," he said. "It's a moral travesty. In a way, we cannot pray even for a political victory until we've experienced a spiritual revival. That's going to solve this problem, not us making nuisances of ourselves in front of doorways."

"We go to the rescues to save the children, but not until our hearts change and we open our world, hearts, and homes to those children will we solve the problem."

Moses said that of the 57,000 people involved in protest movements in the United States, over 27,000 have been arrested, which he described as five times the amount of people arrested during the civil rights movement in the 1960s.

Moses, a former financial and political consultant in Austin, has been arrested on charges of trespassing and spent time in jail on three different occasions during rescues. He said he refuses to pay bond because the money goes to the government, which supports abortion centers.

"If there is suffering to be done, I will suffer for the children," he said. "We all are guilty. The last prayer we can pray is a prayer for justice. We can pray for mercy — a prayer for us all."

The American public must be concerned about the reality of living in a system which has come to support a "child-killing industry," Moses said.

He compared the American press' handling of the abortion issue to the way the Chinese government withheld information about the massacre in Tiananmen Square.

"Remember how they were saying in China four days after the massacre that nobody died?," Moses said. "We were shocked they could say that, but that's what the press in America has been saying for years — 'Nobody's dying. God We did for 16 years exactly what Chinese are doing now.'"

Moses said 40 percent of women who have abortions also have had one.

"These are convenience abortions," he said. "Most of these women repeat customers and, depending which study you read, up to 70 percent of them are engaged in birth control."

Moses blamed religious denunciations for idly standing by an abortion "has gotten out of hand."

"God is not upset with us because there's a law that says you can't have children. He is upset with us because there is a church that has stood idly by while 25 million children have been killed," he said. "God doesn't care about the law."

"When you are a bald eagle, you are fully protected by the law. When you are an innocent unborn child, it's open season on you."

Abortion

reported 82,473 abortions in 1987. The majority of women who obtain abortions in Texas are single, white and older than 25.

No facilities in Bryan-College Station are equipped to give abortions. However, the B-CS phone book lists 12 abortion "information and services" numbers. Ten of the services are in Austin, Houston and Dallas, and they all perform abortions. The only two local numbers listed — The Brazos Valley Crisis Pregnancy Services and Planned Parenthood of Brazos Valley — do not give abortions.

Judie Bruegger, director of Crisis Pregnancy Services, said they counsel women and discuss options with them, however, they do not refer them to abortion clinics.

Planned Parenthood does give referrals.

Susan Neeney, associate director for community relations at Planned Parenthood in Houston, said its affiliate in College Station doesn't give abortions because facilities in Houston accommodate the Bryan-College Station community.

Neeney said that while the Court's ruling will do little to affect Planned Parenthood directly, since only 4 percent of its clients seek abortions, it will affect them indirectly.

"The Legislature in Austin now has the power to tell a woman living anywhere in the state under what circumstances she can have an abortion," Neeney said. "And that's wrong."

Neeney said that whatever the Legislature decides, women will not stop having abortions.

"Abortions will take place regardless," she said. "The decision the state makes will only reflect the value they place on a woman's life. Even if they go so far as to go back to the days before Roe v. Wade, women will go back that far too, and once again they will be at a high risk when they get abortions."

Moses refuted pro-choice arguments that the ruling will encourage more women to undergo dangerous "back alley" abortions, which are described as unsafe because the doctors often use outdated and unsterilized equipment.

"When people start telling you about the horrors of the back alley abortions with coat hangers, you are about to hear the big lie," he said.

"The reality is this — deaths from legal abortions had almost reached zero before Roe v. Wade because of the introduction of antibiotics and modern suction techniques. Now (women) are getting botched up and nobody is trying to help them."

Neeney called Moses' rationale "ludicrous."

"Moses is being cavalier to suggest everything will be fine," she said. "Let's get serious. If you want to send a woman to get antibiotics, the black market, good luck."

"Women are not going to get an adequate medical care even though there's been huge advances in medicine. Rich women can, but poor women living in Bryan-College Station can't even get to another town, are going to get antibiotics."
