Legislators tackle key elements of bill to aid ailing S&Ls

WASHINGTON (AP) — House and Senate negotiators Thursday tackled two of the most important elements of President Bush's proposed savings and loan bailout: How to pay for it and how to make sure there isn't another crisis.

First on the agenda as lawmakers try to meld House and Senate versions of the S&L bill is a proposed tougher capital standard requiring that S&L owners risk more of their own money as a buffer between losses and the government deposit insurance fund.

Bush has identified raising capital levels as the key change needed to discourage S&Ls from making the kinds of risky investments that led to the current crisis, which is requiring a taxpayer rescue of at least $157 billion.

The House bill generally has tougher standards and would force S&L owners to come up with $3 in "real money" capital for every $100 in lending. The Senate standard is $1.50 per $100 in lending.

Conferees must decide how to phase out a special accounting break known as regulatory goodwill, which has allowed some healthy institutions that took over ailing S&Ls in the early 1980s to operate without real capital.

The House would largely do away with regulatory goodwill in five years, while the Senate allows 25 years. Aides say the compromise likely will be closer to the House version.

The House version forbids S&Ls from buying high-yield, high-risk securities nicknamed junk bonds and would force S&Ls already holding junk bonds to sell them within two years. The Senate bill adopts current rules, limiting junk bond holdings to 11 percent of assets.

Lawmakers must choose between two ways of paying for the bailout: the Senate version, backed by the Bush administration, or the House version, supported by most Democrats.

Dealer offers to sell guns used in UT killing spree

GARLAND (AP) — A gun dealer is offering to sell the seven guns that Charles Whitman carried to the top of the University of Texas Tower for a bloody rampage that left 16 dead, according to news reports Thursday.

The three rifles, one shotgun and three pistols are said to be the ones used in the 1966 attack in which 31 people were wounded.

The Austin American-Statesman and the Houston Chronicle reported that Wayne Buxton of Richardson has advertised the guns for sale in the past three issues of a gun collectors' publication.

The American-Statesman said Buxton instructed editors of "Shotgun News" not to divulge his name or phone number to callers. But, the newspaper said, it linked the post-office box number given in the classified ad to Buxton, who owns a gun and pawn shop in suburban Garland.

Buxton did not return telephone calls Thursday from the Associated Press.

The gun dealer told the newspapers he doesn't want to discuss what the ads call The Whitman Collection because "there's too much pain in the state of Texas" associated with the slayings.

"I have no interest whatsoever in resurrecting pain or any sad feelings," he said. "It's a source of pain to certain people, and I don't want to get into that."

Buxton, describing the pain as "a function of time," said the pistol used to kill President Lincoln is now a tourist attraction in a museum in Washington, D.C.

The Chronicle said Buxton, who is seeking $7,500 for the collection, would not say how he obtained the weapons, but claims they are authentic. KDFW-TV in Dallas said Buxton told the station he does not own the weapons, but is acting as the agent for the owner, whom he would not identify.
